In Massachusetts a judgment recovered in the Superior Court is vacated by the allowance of exceptions by the Supreme Court, and the debtor having obtained a discharge in insolvency pending such exceptions, may be permitted to waive them and plead his discharge.

view has been taken in many cases.¹ If an appeal is pending at the time the discharge is granted, it is held that the right to prosecute the appeal is not barred thereby.² In some jurisdictions the recovery of a judgment pending an insolvency proceeding is prevented by a statutory provision that any action for a provable debt, whether brought before or after the defendant therein has filed his petition in insolvency, shall be continued until the insolvency proceedings are closed.³ It is the duty of the insolvent, however, to ask for a continuance, and if he neglects to do so and judgment is rendered against him, a discharge in the insolvency proceeding will not affect the judgment.⁴

Judgments Rendered After the Discharge, however, are not affected, if the debtor failed to interpose the discharge as a defense,⁵ but it has been held that in a proper case the judgment may be opened, so as to enable the debtor to interpose the discharge as a defense.⁶

If the Original Debt Was Not Dischargeable, but has been reduced to judgment, the effect thereon of a discharge subsequently granted depends on whether or not a judgment operates as a merger of the original debt. It has been held that such merger takes place, and that the debt is therefore discharged,⁷ but other

In Leisure v. Kneeland, 2 Wash. 537, 26 Am. St. Rep. 888, a voluntary insolvency proceeding was instituted while an action was pending against the debtor to foreclose a mortgage. After a discharge had been granted to the debtor, but before it was entered, a judgment was rendered against him in the foreclosure suit for the full amount of the mortgage debt, with a direction that the mortgaged premises be sold and the proceeds applied to the debt. It was held that the mortgagee's right to sue the debtor for a deficiency arising on sale was not affected by such discharge, because it took effect, not on the day that it was entered, but on the day that it was granted, which was before the rendition of the judgment of foreclosure.

and more numerous decisions are to the effect that a debt is not merged in a judgment so far as to change its nature, and that, if it is one which the bankruptcy or insolvency law expressly declares shall not be discharged, it remains in force, notwithstanding the fact that it has been reduced to judgment.¹ Thus, it is held by this line of decisions, that the discharge does not affect judgments recovered for debts created by fraud,² or incurred while the debtor was acting in a fiduciary capacity.³

The Costs included in a judgment are considered as accessory to the debt, and are included in the discharge if the judgment is barred.⁴

(a) Lien Debts. — Since a discharge in bankruptcy or insolvency is not an extinguishment of the debts owing by the bankrupt or insolvent, but merely a personal release, it follows that any lien which was valid and enforceable at the time the proceeding was commenced remains unimpaired,⁵ unless it has been waived by proof of the debt as unsecured,⁶ or has been dissolved by

Damages for Breach of Covenants. — A covenant against incumbrances is broken by the existence of an incumbrance. The amount thereof is provable on the subsequent bankruptcy of the covenantor, and his liability therefor is consequently released by his discharge. Bailey v. Moore, 21 Ill. 165; Parker v. Soule, 56 Miss. 549. See also Sleeper v. Miller, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 594, note.

The Distinction between the two classes of cases referred to in the text, that is, those which are dischargeable and those which are not, is that in the one case the demands are in existence and in a condition, so that this value may be estimated, while in the other there is a mere contingency whether there ever will be a demand. *Woodard v. Assessments on Corporate Stock. — According to the principle stated in the text, the bankrupt is not relieved from liability for assessments on shares of stock made after the discharge, where the shares were not accepted by the assignee, because in such case the Rents Accruing After the Discharge are an ordinary instance of the matter in question. A claim for future rents is a claim dependent on a contingency and is not capable of valuation within the statutes providing for the proof of contingent debts, and therefore it is held that the discharge of the lessee in bankruptcy does not release him from liability on future instalments of rent, unless it is so provided by the statute,¹ as is sometimes done.² Though the present bankruptcy law of the United States (1898) contains no such provision, it has nevertheless been held that the bankruptcy of a tenant terminates the lease and cancels all liability for future instalments of rent.³

(g) Time of Accrual of Liabilities. — Under the English statute, all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the debtor is subject at the date of the receiving order, or to which he may become subject before his discharge, by reason of any obligation incurred before the date of the receiving order, are provable, and are therefore barred by the discharge.⁴ Under the bankruptcy law of the United States, the operation of a release is limited to debts and liabilities existing at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed,⁵ and the rule is generally the same under the state insolvency laws.⁶

Note Given for Pre-existing Debt. — It has accordingly been held that an obligation incurred after the petition was filed, though for a pre-existing consideration, is not affected by the discharge. An instance of this is where a note is given by the debtor for a debt which existed before the petition was filed.⁷ shares still belonged to the bankrupt. Glenn v. Howard, 65 Md. 40.

Employment of Counsel. — In Maybin v. Raymond, 15 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 353, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,338, it was held that, where the bankrupt had employed counsel to conduct a suit for a contingent fee, payable out of the recovery, the counsel were entitled to such fee though they recovered after the bankrupt's discharge.

2. Future Rents Barred by Terms of Statute. — The Massachusetts statute provides that if any property of a debtor consists of a lease whereby he is liable for rent, the assignee, at any time, may, and at the request of either the debtor or the lessor shall elect, either to accept and hold under a lease or to disclaim the same, and if he elects to disclaim, such lease shall thereupon be deemed to have been surrendered; and the debtor, provided he obtains his discharge in insolvency, shall be discharged from all liability under or by reason of said lease, whether the assignee does or does not disclaim. Mason v. Clough, 155 Mass. 389; Pub. Stat. Mass., c. 157, § 26. Compare the statutes in other jurisdictions.

5. Only Liabilities Existing When Petition Was

Filed Dischargeable in United States. — Act July 1, 1898, §§ 17, 63.

The Act of 1867 was the same in this respect as the Act of 1898. Stern v. Nussbaum, (C. Pl. Gen. T.) 47 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 489; Jersey City Ins. Co. v. Archer, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 7 N. Y. St. Rep. 326, affirmed 122 N. Y. 376.

Money Borrowed for Expenses of Proceeding. — The rule that all debts existing at the time the petition was filed are barred has been held to apply to a note given by the bankrupt only two days before he filed his petition, though it recited that it was given for "cash bona fide advanced to enable him to take the benefit of the bankrupt law, and without such advance it would be impossible for him to do so." *Nelson v. Rents Accruing After Adjudication. — So, too, it has been held that rent is not barred, where it accrues pending a bankruptcy proceeding and before the discharge,¹ or where it becomes due after the discharge on account of the occupation of the premises at the time.²

Payments by Sureties and Indorsers. — The effect of a discharge in respect to sureties, indorsers, etc., who pay the debt after the discharge has been granted to the principal debtor, will be considered presently.³

Judgments. — The effect of a discharge on a judgment recovered after the adjudication has already been considered.⁴

Costs. — A discharge in bankruptcy does not bar a claim for costs awarded against the bankrupt in an action pending at the time of the discharge.⁵

Debts Contracted Before Passage of Law. — A discharge granted under a state insolvency law cannot affect a debt contracted before the passage of the law, because the states are expressly forbidden by the Federal Constitution to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts;⁶ but this rule does not apply where the original debt has been paid by giving a new obligation in its place,⁷ and the creditor, by participating in the proceeding, may also waive his right to deny the validity of the discharge as to such debt.⁸

(h) Taxes and Other Debts Due the Government. — In England, debts due the crown are not barred by a discharge in bankruptcy, if the statute does not expressly so provide.⁹

In the United States the doctrine of the English cases is applied to debts due from a bankrupt or insolvent to the federal government,¹⁰ and also, as a Judgment Rendered After Passage of Law on Pre-existing Debt. — Whether a judgment rendered after the passage of the insolvency law on a debt existing previously merges the debt so as to bring it within the operation of the discharge, depends on the effect given to judgments in the particular jurisdiction. In some states it is held that a judgment, instead of being regarded strictly as a new debt, is held to be merely the old debt in a new form, so that the debt is not barred by the discharge. Conway v. Seamons, 55 Vt. 8, 45 Am. Rep. 579.

In other states it is held that the merger takes place. Sampson v. Clark, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 173; Faxon v. Baxter, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 37; Bangs v. Watson, 9 Gray (Mass.) 211; Pierce v. Eaton, 11 Gray (Mass.) 398; Wolcott v. Hodge, 15 Gray (Mass.) 547, 77 Am. Dec. 381; Bradford v. Rice, 102 Mass. 472, 3 Am. Rep. 483. Formerly in Massachusetts, the contrary doctrine was held. Betts v. Bagley, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 572.

As to the effect of a judgment as a merger of the original cause of action, see generally the title MERGER.

7. Renewal Note. — Where a note given before the enactment of the insolvent law, is taken up and another note given after the enactment, and there is nothing to rebut the presumption of payment of the old note by the new one, the debt is barred by a discharge in insolvency. Snow v. Foster, 79 Me. 558.

But a Mere Extension of Time to pay a debt given after the passage of the law does not bring the debt within the operation of the discharge. Lambert v. Scandinavian-American Bank, 66 Minn. 185.

It is now provided by statute that an order of discharge shall not release the bankrupt from any debt with which the bankrupt may be chargeable at the suit of the crown. 46 & 47 Vict., c. 52, § 30, par. (1).

general rule, to debts due a state.¹

(i) Partnership Debts. — In England the rule is well settled that if a member of a partnership is individually adjudged a bankrupt and granted a discharge, it operates as a release of his liability for the debts of the firm, as well as his individual debts.² And, conversely, the individual debts of the partners are discharged by a joint proceeding.³

In the United States the weight of authority accords with the English doctrine.⁴ It has been held, however, that such a discharge will not release the bankrupt from liability on his partnership debts, if there was no proceeding by or against the firm,⁵ and some cases hold that a separate discharge will relieve the bankrupt from the firm debts only in cases where there was no firm property at the time the discharge was granted.⁶

(j) Fiduciary Debts — aa. STATUTORY PROVISIONS. — The bankruptcy and insolvency laws, probably without exception, provide that a discharge shall not release a debtor from any debt created by his fraud, misappropriation, etc., while acting in any fiduciary capacity or as a public officer.¹

bb. WHAT CONSTITUTES FIDUCIARY RELATION—Technical Trusts.—The existence of a technical or special trust clearly constitutes the fiduciary relation contemplated by the statutes.² In this category are all trustees proper,³ executors and administrators,⁴ and guardians.⁵ The exception to the operation of the release relates only to the trustee himself, without affecting any one who is liable with him, and therefore the liability of a surety on the bond of a trustee or public officer is released by the discharge of the surety in bankruptcy.⁶ It is also held that the liabilities which are not dischargeable are those only of the trustees to the beneficiary,⁷ and such as were created while acting in the fiduciary capacity, excluding any liability that may have been created by contract between the parties in reference to the subject of the trust.⁸

Implied Trusts. — Though there are some decisions to the contrary, it is now well settled that implied trusts do not come within the statutory provision under consideration. Therefore a discharge releases all debts incurred by persons while acting as ordinary agents,¹ attorneys at law,² bailees,³ pledgees,⁴ bankers,⁵ brokers, factors and commission merchants,⁶ or in any case where mere trust or confidence is reposed in the debtor in the popular sense of the terms.⁷

In Herrlich v. McDonall, 80 Cal. 472, the creditor employed the debtor to purchase mining stock for her, and gave her three thousand six hundred dollars to be used for that purpose. The debtor purchased the stocks for said amount, but refused to deliver them or to pay over the dividends. It was held that this transaction created a fiduciary relation, because the stocks, when purchased, were the property of the creditor, and the debtor held them as trustee for her; and a distinction was drawn between a case like the present and one where the dealings are between a general factor and his client.

And in another case an auctioneer was held to act in a fiduciary character within the meaning of the Act of 1841. Jure Lord, 5 Law Rep. 258, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,501.

cc. EFFECT OF PROVING DEBT. — Under the bankruptcy law of 1841 it was held that if a creditor elected to prove a fiduciary debt, it would then be barred by the discharge, the same as other debts,¹ but under the Act of 1867 making proof had no such effect.²

(k) Debts Contracted by Fraud. — Another instance of debts specially excepted by the statutes from the operation of the discharge is found in those which are created by the fraud of the debtor.³

Actual, Positive Fraud in the creation of the debt is necessary to bring a case within the exception. An implied or constructive fraud is not sufficient.⁴

Fraud in Creation of Debt. — The debt must have been created by the fraud of the debtor. Fraud subsequent to the creation of the debt does not affect the discharge.⁵

Proving the Debt and Receiving Dividends thereon does not bring the debt within the operation of the discharge, but the debtor still remains liable for so much as may be unpaid.⁶

What Are Debts Created by Fraud. — Common instances of debts not releasable by a discharge in bankruptcy or insolvency because created by fraud, are where goods are purchased on credit by the false representations of the purchaser as

Pledge of Goods Held as Collateral Security. — Where a debtor who holds goods as collateral security under a contract which authorizes him to sell, transfer, or hypothecate them for his own use, pledges such goods, and the pledgee sells them after the insolvency of the debtor, the debt created by the failure of the debtor to restore the goods to the owner is not "a debt or claim against a pledgee created by his sale of collateral securities in a manner not authorized by his contract with the pledgor," within the Massachusetts statute providing that no such debt shall be released by a discharge in insolvency. *Wilson v. to his financial condition,¹ or where the purchaser knows that he is insolvent, and purchases with the intention of disposing of the goods without paying for them,² or where the claim is for damages for false representations concerning property sold by the bankrupt to the claimant,³ or where worthless collaterals were knowingly given as security for a loan,⁴ or where money is obtained by false representations.⁵ But a debt is not created by fraud in the case of liability on a replevin bond given by a fraudulent purchaser of goods which had been seized under attachment at the suit of creditors of the seller,⁶ or in case of a judgment for the seduction of the plaintiff's daughter not accomplished under a promise of marriage fraudulently made for the purpose.⁷

Liability of Partners for Acts of Copartner. — Where a firm debt is created by the fraud of one of the partners, those who did not participate in the fraud are nevertheless chargeable therewith to the extent that a discharge in bankruptcy does not relieve them of liability for such debt.⁸

(1) Liabilities Arising Out of Torts. — An unliquidated claim for damages arising out of a tort is not provable in bankruptcy or insolvency and is not barred by the discharge,⁹ and it has been held that where the claimant has the option of suing either in contract or in tort, the form of his action will determine whether his claim is barred by the discharge or not.¹⁰

held to bar the claim of a domestic creditor who was a party to the bankruptcy proceeding, or received a dividend under it,¹ and will always be recognized as a bar to debts contracted in the country where it was granted, if the creditors, as well as the debtor, are residents of that country.²

Effect of Domestic Discharge on Foreign Creditors. — The rule that has been laid down in England is that a discharge releases the bankrupt from all his contracts in any part of the world, so far as their enforcement in the English courts is concerned.³ In the United States the authorities do not agree as to whether a discharge in bankruptcy is a bar to an action by a foreign creditor in this country. The federal courts hold that the discharge does operate as such a bar, and in some state courts the same rule has been laid down,⁴ but in other states the decisions are to the contrary.⁵

bb. DISCHARGE UNDER STATE INSOLVENCY LAWS — Nonresidence of Creditors. — A discharge under a state insolvent law is wholly ineffectual to release the debtor from the claims of nonresidents of the state who do not in any way assent to or acquiesce therein,⁶ even in case of an appearance to contest the discharge,¹ because the insolvency laws of a state have no extra-territorial operation which will conclude the rights of creditors who are citizens of other states.²

Foreign Corporations Doing Business in State. — The fact that a foreign corporation has obtained a license to do business in the state, and has appointed an agent or attorney on whom process in any action or proceeding against it may be served, does not bring it within the jurisdiction of the insolvency courts, and therefore a debt due it from a citizen is not affected by the discharge of the debtor. Hammond Beef, etc., Co. v. Best, 91 Me. 431; Bergner, etc., Brewing Co. v. Dreyfus, 172 Mass. 154.

Partnership Having Nonresident Member. — In Chase v. Henry, 160 Mass. 577, 55 Am. St. Rep. 423, it was held that a discharge under the laws of Massachusetts did not bar a debt due a partnership doing business in the state where one of the members thereof was neither a citizen nor a resident of the state. From this conclusion of the majority of the court, Field, C. J., and Allen and Holmes, JJ., dissented.

Assignment by Nonresident to Resident. — If a claim held by a nonresident is assigned to a resident of the debtor's state, such claim is brought within the operation of the insolvency laws of that state and is released by the discharge of the debtor. Wheelock v. Leonard, 20 Pa. St. 440.

If the Debtor Becomes a Resident of the Creditor's State and takes the benefit of the insolvency laws thereof, the debt is discharged. Beal v. Burchstead, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 523.

Evidence of Residence. — A debtor residing in California obtained a discharge in 1859, under the insolvent laws of that state. The creditor had been a citizen of New York, and went to California in 1850, and resided there at intervals till 1854, when he returned to New York. He again went to California in 1855, and remained there three years. In each case he went on business, purposing to return when that business was completed. His family remained in New York during the whole time. He voted once or twice in California. It was held that the facts did not necessarily constitute him a citizen of California when the discharge was granted so as to make such discharge effectual against him. Easterly v. Goodwin, 35 Conn. 279, 95 Am. Dec. 237.

The Burden of Proof is on the creditor to show that he was not a citizen or resident of the state at the time the discharge was granted. Porter v. Imus, 79 Cal. 183.

Notes Made to a Resident and by Him Transferred to a Nonresident are not barred by the discharge in insolvency of the maker, if the transferee has not voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the laws of the state where the discharge was granted. *Security Sav., etc., Co. v. A Contract Made by a Nonresident through a Resident Agent is not on that account within the operation of the debtor's discharge in insolvency. Regina Flour Mill Co. v. Holmes, 156 Mass. 11.

state,¹ or that the creditor was a resident at the time the debt was contracted, but subsequently became a nonresident.²

In Case a Claim Stands in the Name of a Third Person, in a representative capacity, the beneficial interest being in others, the debt will be released only in case such representative is a resident of the state where the discharge was granted.³

Where the Court Had Jurisdiction of Both the Debtor and the Creditor, the discharge is available as a defense in an action in any other jurisdiction, to recover a debt that was provable in the insolvency proceeding.⁴

Contracts Made in Other States. — The principle that the insolvency laws of a state have no extra-territorial effect is also applicable in the case of a debt arising under a contract made in another state, and accordingly it is held that such a debt is not affected by the discharge, though at the time of the insolvency proceeding both the debtor and the creditor are residents of the state under whose laws the insolvency proceeding was instituted.⁵

And it is immaterial that the agent did not disclose his principal at the time of making the contract, and the debtor thought that the agent was contracting in his own right. Guernsey v. Wood, 130 Mass. 503.

The Forum in which the creditor seeks to enforce his claim is immaterial. The discharge is inoperative as against him everywhere. Soule v. Chase, 39 N. Y. 342; Bedell v. Scruton, 54 Vt. 493; Weber v. Yancy, 7 Wash. 84.

2. Creditor Becoming Nonresident After Debt Was Contracted. — Pullen v. Hillman, 84 Me. 129, 30 Am. St. Rep. 340; Norris v. Atkinson, 64 N. H. 87; Roberts v. Atherton, 60 Vt. 563, 6 Am. St. Rep. 133. But see contra, Brigham v. Henderson, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 430, 48 Am. Dec. 610; Converse v. Bradley, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 434, note; Stoddard v. Harrington, 100 Mass. 87, 1 Am. Rep. 92. The case last cited was considered by the court in Pullen v. Hillman, 84 Me. 129, 30 Am. St. Rep. 340, cited supra, this note, and the opinion was expressed that such decision could not be sustained, and that it must be overruled when the question should be again presented.

3. Where a Creditor Is a Trustee, residing in the state, and the debt is due to him as such, the discharge of the debtor operates against all the beneficiaries of the trust, nonresidents as well as residents. Wade v. Sewell, 56 Fed. Rep. 129.

Thus where a nonresident creditor assigns his claim to a resident attorney for collection, and the attorney recovers judgment thereon in his own name, such judgment is barred by the discharge of the debtor in insolvency. French v. Robinson, 86 Me. 142, 41 Am. St. Rep. 533.

An Ancillary Administrator was appointed in Massachusetts to collect a judgment recovered by the decedent in New Hampshire, of which state both were citizens, against a citizen of Massachusetts. The judgment debtor, having obtained his discharge in the insolvency court of Massachusetts, claimed that it barred a recovery by such special administrator on the theory that, for the purposes of an action by him in his representative capacity, he must be considered a citizen of the state in which he was appointed (Massachusetts); but it was held that no distinction could be made between the natural and the artificial person for any such purpose, and that therefore the judgment was not barred by the discharge. Adams v. Batchelder, 173 Mass. 258. Compare Crow v. Coons, 27 Mo. 512, where a resident attorney, to whom a note, held by a nonresident, had been sent for collection, took a renewal note payable to himself as "attorney of" the creditor. While this note remained in the hands of the attorney the debtor obtained a discharge under the insolvency laws. It was held that the discharge did not release the debtor from liability on the note which was afterwards indorsed by the attorney to the creditor and sent to him in the state of his residence.

Abandonment of Extra-territorial Immunity. — While the rights of nonresident creditors cannot be affected against their will by the discharge of their debtor under the insolvency laws of the state of his residence, they have the right to abandon or waive their extra-territorial immunity, and this they may do by voluntarily becoming parties to the insolvency proceeding, or accepting dividends thereunder.¹ It requires, however, some such conduct on their part, and such a claim is not released by the discharge of the debtor, merely because it was named in the petition and schedule in the insolvency proceeding.²

(2) Exemption from Arrest and Imprisonment. — The discharge of a debtor in bankruptcy or insolvency releases him from liability to future arrests.³ The state insolvency laws also provide that the discharge shall relieve the

A Judgment Rendered in Another State is a foreign contract within this rule, and a discharge in insolvency will not affect such judgment, though, when the insolvency proceedings were instituted and the discharge granted, both the debtor and the creditor resided in the state where the discharge was granted. New York. — Witt v. Follett, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 457.

Participation in, or Assent to, the Insolvency Proceeding by a nonresident creditor is essential to constitute an abandonment or waiver of his extra-territorial immunity, and the mere fact of his appearance in the court of insolvency for some other purpose is not sufficient. Thus, in one case it was held that creditors did not participate in the insolvency proceeding so as to conclude them by the discharge of the debtor, where they brought suit against a syndic of the estate to enforce a vendor's lien on some goods sold by them to the debtor, and went into the insolvency court to take a rule to have certain goods delivered to them which they alleged were his property and not included in the cessio bonorum made by the debtor. Sylvester v. Danziger, 32 Fed. Rep. 1.

In another case it was held that bringing in a state court a suit which was, under the laws of the state, transferred to the insolvency court in which the defendant's insolvency proceedings were then pending, and cumulating that suit with such proceedings, was not a participation therein in such manner as to constitute an assent to the defendant's discharge. Hyde v. Stone, 20 How. (U. S.) 170.

Accepting a Dividend in Composition Proceedings is equivalent to proving the claim. Murray v. Roberts, 150 Mass. 353, 15 Am. St. Rep. 209.

Proving Claim Against One of Two Firms in Insolvency Proceedings Against Both. — Where there are two firms, one of which is composed of some of the members of the other, and a foreign creditor of both proves his claim against one in insolvency proceedings which include both firms, his claim against the other is not affected by a discharge granted to all the debtors. Pattee v. Paige, 163 Mass. 352, 47 Am. St. Rep. 459.

Assignment by Foreign Creditor—Liability Over to Assignee. — In Columbia Falls Erick Co. v. Glidden, 157 Mass. 175, the debtor had made a note to a foreign corporation, which had it discounted at a bank. On the insolvency of the maker, the bank presented the note as a claim, receiving a dividend on account of it, and compelled the assignor to pay the difference between such dividend and the amount of the note. It was held that the effect of the presentation of the claim on the note and the receipt of the dividend by the bank was to bring the note within the operation of the discharge in the insolvency proceeding, and that the claim of the payee against the maker, on account of the amount that it was obliged to pay the bank, was a part of the maker's original indebtedness, and was therefore barred by the discharge.

The Exemption Is Waived where the discharged debtor promises to pay a debt which was released by the discharge. Kenyon v. Worslev, 2 R. I. 341.

Imprisonment for Disobeying Order of Court. — A person who is imprisoned for disobedience of an order to pay over money collected in violation of an injunction is not entitled to be discharged from imprisonment by reason of a subsequent discharge in bankruptcy. In re Meggett, (Wis. 1900) 81 N. W. Rep. 419.

A Debtor Imprisoned under Process of a Federal Court cannot be discharged by a state officer acting under a state insolvency law. Duncan v. Darst, 1 How. (U. S.) 301; Sadler v. Fallen, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 190. See contra, Wood v. Funk, 7 Ohio (pt. i.) 196.

2. Bankruptcy Court Not Authorized to Release from Existing Imprisonment. — The provision of the statute is that "a bankrupt shall be exempt from arrest upon civil process, except" in certain cases. Act July 1, 1893 (30 U. S. Stat. at L. 544), § 9, par. a.

Under a similar provision in the Act of 1867, it was held that the bankruptcy court had no power to release a debtor who was imprisoned before the bankruptcy proceeding was commenced. Re Walker, 1 Lowell (U. S.) 222, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 318, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,060; Hazleton v. Valentine, 1 Lowell (U. S.) 270, 2 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 31, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,287; Stockwell v. Sillo-way, 100 Mass. 287.

The application for release from imprisonment in such case must be made to the state court. In re O'Mara, 4 Biss. (U. S.) 506, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,509.

4. Discharge Limited to Civil Actions. — Clements v. Camden County, 51 N. J. L. 424; Perth Amboy v. Brophy, 43 N. J. L. 589, holding that under the New Jersey statute a discharge cannot be granted to one who is in custody under an execution issued on a judgment of conviction imposing a fine for violation of a city ordinance; Com. v. Miller, 12 Phila. (Pa.) 509, 34 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 20.

(3) New Promise to Pay Debt Released. — The discharge of the debtor does not operate as an absolute extinguishment or satisfaction of the debt, but merely releases the debtor from his legal obligation to pay. The moral obligation remains and furnishes a sufficient consideration for a new promise to pay the debts discharged, and such promise is therefore valid and enforceable,²

1. Discharge Not Limited to Civil Actions. — In Pennsylvania a person who is sentenced to pay costs in a criminal proceeding and committed to jail in default of payment may be discharged under the insolvency law. Conley's Petition, 3 Pa. Dist. 623.

In North Carolina, one who has been adjudged to be the father of a bastard and committed for nonpayment of the allowance to the mother, and the fine and costs of the proceeding, may be discharged from imprisonment under the insolvent debtor's act. State v. Parsons, 115 N. Car. 730.

Promise by Third Person. — Since the debts are not extinguished by the discharge, a promise by a third person to pay a creditor whose debt has been so released, whereupon the debt is to be regarded as wholly extinguished, is supported by a sufficient consideration. Webster v. Le Compte, 74 Md. 249.

The sons of a bankrupt are not under a moral obligation to pay the debts from which their father has been discharged, and therefore their promise to do so, made after his death, is without consideration. McElven v. Sloan, 56 Ga. 208.

The Question Whether the New Promise Is the Real Cause of Action, and the discharged debt the consideration that supports it, or whether the new promise operates as a waiver of the defense given by the discharge against the original demand, has occasioned great diversity of opinion. In some jurisdictions the former view is adopted.² But the weight of authority is that the new promise revives the old debt, and that the cause of action is on it and not on the new promise.³

Co-obligors' Claim for Reimbursement. — It is generally held that if a person secondarily liable with a bankrupt or insolvent, such as a surety, indorser, etc., makes a payment on account of the debt, after his principal has been discharged, his claim for reimbursement is not one arising after the bankruptcy, where his liability constituted a provable claim;¹ and if the creditor neglects to prove, the surety or indorser may discharge the debt, and prove it in his own name, or the court may permit him to prove it for his own benefit, without payment.² There are cases, however, which hold that a payment by a surety, etc., after the discharge of the principal debtor, creates a new debt which is not barred by the discharge.³

Contribution Between Bankrupt and His Co-obligor. — Though the liability of a bankrupt or insolvent as a surety or indorser is released by the discharge, as far as the creditor is concerned,⁴ yet if another is bound with him as co-surety for the same debt, such co-surety's claim for contribution, on payment of the debt, is not barred by the discharge, where the payment was made after the discharge was granted,¹ but it is barred where the payment was made before the discharge was granted, because in that event the claim was provable against the bankrupt's estate.² So, too, a claim for contribution is barred where the joint obligors were not co-sureties for a third person, but were both principal debtors, because in that case each is a surety for the other or others for the amount of the debt above his own proportionate share,³ and the rule in regard to the reimbursement of sureties applies.⁴

Set-off of Claim for Contribution or Reimbursement. — Even where a claim for contribution or reimbursement is barred, it is still available as a set-off against any liability to the bankrupt. trade after knowledge of insolvency,¹ contracted debts without reasonable expectation of ability to pay,² indulged in vexatious litigation,³ or has been guilty of certain other acts or omissions.⁴

In the United States, the statutes are generally more liberal to the debtor than is the English statute in this respect. The present federal bankruptcy law gives only two grounds for refusing a discharge, viz.: that the bankrupt has committed an offense punishable by imprisonment under the statute, or that he has destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account.⁵ These grounds, and those specified in the state insolvency laws, will be considered in the following paragraphs of this section.

Only Statutory Grounds Available. — It is well settled that the right of the debtor to his discharge in a bankruptcy or insolvency proceeding can be denied only on some ground designated in the statute,⁶ with the exception, of course, that want of jurisdiction may always be made a ground of opposition.⁷ According to this rule it has been held that a discharge will not be refused because of irregularities on the part of the assignee or others for which the debtor was not responsible,⁸ or because a previous application had been denied merely on account of irregularities in the proceedings,⁹ if the denial did not involve a final adjudication adverse to the right of the debtor to a discharge.¹⁰

(2) Offenses Against Statute. — The statutes both in England and in the United States provide that a discharge may be refused where the debtor has been guilty of certain criminal offenses.¹¹

Reserving Property as Exempt, when it is not properly subject to exemption, may not afford cause for denying a discharge, if the reservation was made in good faith. A Mere Belief that the bankrupt is concealing property is not sufficient to justify refusing his discharge. The fact must be established, and the creditors may do this by examination of the bankrupt. In re Thomas, 92 Fed. Rep. 912.

The English Statute does not expressly name the concealment of property or the listing of false debts as a ground for refusing a discharge, but the very comprehensive provision that the court, on consideration of the "bankrupt's conduct and affairs," may either grant or refuse a discharge, would seem to include this ground as well as others.¹

The State Insolvency Laws, also, generally provide that a discharge may be refused if the debtor was guilty of false swearing as to any material fact in regard to his debts or estate.² This includes falsity in the inventory or schedules, as where the debtor, with intent to defraud, omitted property from his inventory,³ or scheduled debts which did not exist,⁴ and also where he failed to file an inventory, as well as where he filed one that was false or incorrect.⁵

The Fraudulent Intent is always material, and a discharge will not be refused because of omissions which were unintentional, or where the debtor acted on an honest conviction that the item omitted was worthless.⁶

(5) Preferences. — Since one of the chief purposes of bankruptcy and insolvency laws is to secure an equal distribution of a debtor's effects among his creditors, the statutes in some jurisdictions make it a ground for refusing a discharge that the debtor, in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, or within a specified time before proceedings are commenced, preferred one or more creditors.⁷ But this is not the case under the present bankruptcy law of the United States.¹

The Intent of the Debtor to create an unlawful preference is material,² and therefore his right to a discharge cannot be denied on this ground, where the preference was not the result of his voluntary act,³ or where he made a payment or transfer with the bona fide intention and expectation of preventing bankruptcy;⁴ nor can he be charged with the consequences of a fraudulent preference given by his partner without his knowledge or consent.⁵

Insolvency or Contemplation of Insolvency. — In order that a discharge may be refused on the ground that the debtor has preferred creditors, it must appear that, at the time of the act constituting the alleged preference, he was insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency.⁶

The Knowledge of the Creditor that the transfer or payment to him was intended as a preference is not material. If the debtor intended to create a preference, his discharge will be refused, though the creditor had no knowledge of such intent.⁷

(6) Failure to Keep, Concealment, or Destruction of Books of Account. — Failure to Keep Books of Account, such as are usual and proper in the business carried on by the debtor, is usually, if not always, declared by the bankruptcy and insolvency laws to be a ground for refusing to grant a discharge.⁸

Destruction or Concealment of Books. — The bankruptcy law of the United States specifies the destruction or concealment of books, as well as a failure to keep any, as a ground for refusing a discharge.¹ The English statute does not contain this provision in so many words, but it authorizes the court, on an application for a discharge, to take into consideration the "conduct and affairs" of the bankrupt, and grant or refuse it as justice may require.²

What Are "Proper" Books. — The books are "proper" when they are so kept that any competent person, by an examination of them, can ascertain the real condition of the insolvent's affairs, though the books are imperfect and inartistic, and even inaccurate in unimportant particulars.³ If they do not come up to this standard, no discharge can be granted, even though the party acted in good faith.⁴

Time of Act or Omissions. — Failure to keep books of account, or the destruction of books, before the passage of the statute, does not constitute a ground for refusing to grant a discharge,⁵ but such omissions or acts after the passage of the statute are within its operation, though they relate to prior transactions.¹

Intent of Debtor. — Under the bankruptcy law of the United States a discharge will be refused because of the conduct of the bankrupt in regard to books of account, only when he acted with fraudulent intent to conceal his true financial condition,² but the requirement of the English statute is absolute in this particular, as is also the case, as a general rule, with the state insolvency laws; and it is therefore immaterial whether the debtor acted with a fraudulent intent or was merely neglectful of the ordinary principles of business.³

Rule Limited to Merchants or Traders. — The late bankruptcy law of the United States (1867) and some of the state insolvency laws make the provision in regard to keeping books of account applicable only to merchants or traders,⁴ but there is no such limitation in the present federal law,⁵ or in the English statute.⁶

mentioned statute to refuse a discharge if the conduct of the bankrupt is such as to make that course proper, doubtless includes the conduct of the bankrupt in influencing a creditor not to oppose the discharge.¹

(8) Refusal to Submit to Examination. — Under the late bankruptcy law of the United States (1867) a discharge in bankruptcy might be denied if the bankrupt refused to submit to an examination,² and the same consequence was visited on the refusal of his wife to be examined, unless he should show that he was unable to procure her attendance.³ The English statute does not contain this provision, though the court is authorized to withhold a discharge for any misconduct on the part of the bankrupt.⁴

(9) Existence of Debts Not Affected by Discharge. — The fact that the debtor owes debts which would not be affected by the discharge is not made a ground for refusing it. If the party is entitled to his discharge on the facts shown, the court will grant it without any determination as to the debts affected thereby.⁵

that when the statute prescribes a mode for annulling or setting aside a discharge on designated grounds, such mode is exclusive, and the validity of a discharge cannot be questioned, on the grounds named in the statute, in any proceeding other than that prescribed.¹

(2) Who May Make Application. — A proceeding to set aside or annul a discharge may be brought by any creditor or party in interest,² and the fact that a creditor did not oppose the discharge will not prevent him from applying to have it set aside on the statutory grounds, if they were not known to him at the time the discharge was granted,³ or if his failure to oppose the discharge was due to the withdrawal, without notice to him, of objections filed by other creditors, and on which he relied.⁴

(3) Grounds of Relief. — The English statute does not specify the grounds on which the court may set aside the discharge, but merely provides that it may do so "if it thinks fit."⁵ The bankruptcy law of the United States and the state insolvency laws generally authorize the court to set aside a discharge only where it has been procured by fraud,⁶ though some of the statutes allow

Under the California Statute (Act 1895, § 57; Act 1880, § 49), which is almost identical in terms with the Bankruptcy Act of 1867, the practice seems to be uniform in bringing a direct proceeding to set aside a discharge on the grounds specified in the statute. Wagner v. Superior Ct., 100 Cal. 359; Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 152, 27 Am. St. Rep. 101; Estudillo v. Meyerstein, 72 Cal. 317. But it is held that an independent action may be brought to set aside a discharge, and that it is not necessary to make a motion for that purpose in the insolvency proceeding, as the statute merely directs that an application shall be made, within a certain time, to the court by which the discharge was granted, but does not say how the application shall be made. Estudillo v. Meyerstein, 72 Cal. 317.

Under the California Insolvency Act of 1852, a direct proceeding was not necessary. A creditor could impeach the discharge in an action for his debt. Dean v. Baker, 64 Cal. 232.

(4) Time of Application. — The statutes generally provide that an application to set aside a discharge must be made within a certain time after the discharge was granted.² The English statute, however, does not contain this restriction.³

b. COLLATERAL ATTACK — (1) Liability to Collateral Attack — (a) Rule under National Bankruptcy Law. — The rule that has been laid down under the bankruptcy law of the United States is that, since the statute itself prescribes a mode in which a discharge may be set aside, namely, by a direct application to the bankruptcy court, the remedy so given is exclusive, and a discharge cannot be attacked collaterally in either a federal or a state court,⁴ unless it is absolutely void for want of jurisdiction in the court to grant it.⁵

The Act of 1841 permitted a discharge to be collaterally attacked on certain grounds.⁶

XVI. OFFENSES AGAINST INSOLVENCY AND BANKRUPTCY LAWS — 1. Creation of Offenses. — In order to effectuate the purpose, common to all bankruptcy and insolvency laws, of realizing to the best advantage on the debtor's estate, and making a proportionate distribution thereof among his bona fide creditors, certain acts or conduct on the part of the debtor, the officers charged with the administration of the law, or third persons, done with the intent of defeating the purpose of the law, or for the personal benefit of the wrongdoer, at the expense of the creditors, are declared to be offenses punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.³

2. Constitutionality of Penal Provisions. — The power of Congress to enforce, by suitable penalties, all legislation necessary or proper to the execution of the powers with which it is intrusted, undoubtedly authorizes it to prescribe penalties for violation of the provisions of the bankruptcy law;⁴ but a provision making it an offense to obtain money or goods under false pretenses before becoming a bankrupt is unconstitutional, where the statute is not limited in its application to acts committed in contemplation of bankruptcy.⁵

3. Jurisdiction. — The bankruptcy law of the United States gives concurrent jurisdiction of offenses against it to the district courts and the circuit courts of the United States.⁶ Where jurisdiction is not specially conferred by the statute, as is generally the case with the insolvency laws of the states, the offenses are to be prosecuted in those courts having general criminal jurisdiction.⁷

4. Limitations. — The statute sometimes prescribed a special limitation for the prosecution of offenses created thereby. Under the present bankruptcy law of the United States the period is one year after the commission of the offense.⁸

states the settlement of the estates of decedents in case of insolvency is specially provided for by statute.¹

Declaration of Insolvency. — In order to bring an estate within these special statutory provisions, it must be declared insolvent by the court of probate at the instance of or on information furnished by the personal representative or the creditors of the decedent.² The payment of claims in full before the time for the presentation thereof has elapsed does not prevent the administrator from afterwards having the estate declared insolvent.³

Effect of Declaration of Insolvency. — When an estate is declared insolvent, exclusive jurisdiction of claims against it is given to the probate court, and no action at law can be maintained against the executor or administrator by a creditor, except for the pro rata share of his claim, which may be decreed to him in the proceeding.⁴ The estate must then be administered according to statute, though it afterwards proves to be solvent, unless the statute provides otherwise.⁵ Under some statutes the functions of the administrator cease on the declaration of insolvency, and a new administrator is to be appointed, or commissioners are appointed to pass on claims against the estate.⁶

3. Recovery of Payments. — If an administrator pays a claim under an agreement that the creditor will "hold the administrator harmless, in case said estate, on settlement, does not pay enough to cover the above amount," it is not an absolute payment or an admission that the claim is just; and if the estate is declared insolvent and the claim is rejected for want of presentation in time to the administrator, he may recover back the money so paid. *Gorman v. The Administration of an Estate as Insolvent is valid and binding, though it proves to have been solvent in fact. Ticknor v. Harris, 14 N. H. 272, 40 Am. Dec. 186.

The Heirs are not affected by a declaration of insolvency. It simply declares the status of the estate, as between creditors and the administrator. McGuire v. Shelby, 20 Ala. 456; State Bank v. Ellis, 30 Ala. 478; Grant v. Lloyd, 12 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 191; Snodgrass v. Andrews, 30 Miss. 472, 64 Am. Dec. 169; Plumer v. Plumer, 30 N. H. 558.

In Connecticut an executor is not precluded from paying debts, merely because the estate is represented insolvent and the commissioners have not made their report, though it may be that he acts at his peril. Johnson v. Blackman, 11 Conn. 355.

In Louisiana the administrator remains in charge of the estate, but he represents the creditors, and not the deceased. Judson v. Connolly, 4 La. Ann. 169.

Payment of Expenses of Last Illness and Funeral. — After an estate is reported insolvent, the only vouchers for money paid out which can be allowed on settlement with the administrator are, for the "last sickness and necessary funeral expenses." Shadden v. Sterling, 23 Ala. 518.

Failure or Neglect to Suggest Insolvency. — The administrator is chargeable with knowledge of the condition of the estate as soon as the time for the presentation of claims against it has elapsed, and if he neglects to make such suggestion when he knows that the estate is insolvent, the allowance of a claim will render him liable for the amount, where he opposed the allowance solely on the ground that the claim was invalid.¹

Water Main. (See also the title MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.) — In an action against a city for damages for the bursting of a water main the trial court instructed the jury that in order to recover the plaintiff must show by preponderance of evidence that the defects in the pipes were known to the defendant corporation or were of such a character "as to have been readily ascertained upon reasonable inspection thereof." The appellate court said: "It is claimed that the instruction should have gone to the effect that tests should have been used to ascertain the defects in the pipe. We think this objection is far-fetched, and that the appellant has not placed a proper or ordinary construction upon the language used by the court. Inspection is not necessarily confined to optical observation, but is ordinarily understood to embrace tests and examinations. The definition cited from Webster by the appellant, namely, 'to look upon; to examine for the purpose of determining quality and detecting what is wrong and the like,' seems to us sufficient to show the failure of the contention, and we think the ordinarily accepted meaning of the word inspection is fully as broad and comprehensive as the definition given by the lexicographer above. The name 'inspector' is given to a person whose duty it is to make tests of machinery, and it is a generally recognized fact that when an officer or agent of any kind is instructed to inspect, the duty goes beyond a mere survey of the eye, and implies such tests as are necessary to ascertain the quality of the thing inspected, whatever it may be; and we have no doubt that the jury in this case understood that a reasonable inspection meant a reasonable examination." Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Seattle, 16 Wash. 445.

Inspection — Copying. — In People v. General Committee, 25 N. Y. App. Div. 347, it was held that a member of the Republican organization of Erie county, in the state of New York, was entitled to make a copy of enrolment books containing the names of the members of the party qualified to vote at the next primaries, that being included in the right to an inspection, where in so doing he was not taking unnecessary time or interfering with the right of any other member of the party to examine such books.

Compagnie Generale Transatlantique*, 10 Fed. Rep. 362, it was said: "In Burrill's Law Dictionary inspection is defined thus: 'Official view or examination of commodities or manufactures, to ascertain their quality, under some statute requiring it.' In Bouvier's Law Dictionary this is the definition: 'The examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce.' In Clintman v. Northrop, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 45, the inspection laws of New York are said to be laws 'to protect the community, so far as they apply to domestic sales, from fraud and impositions,

The Constitution of Alabama provided that no state office should be continued or created for the inspection of merchandise, manufactures, etc. In construing this provision in State v. McGough, 118 Ala. 159, the court said: "The word inspection has been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States — as accurately, perhaps, as may be elsewhere found — to be 'something which can be accomplished by looking at or weighing or measuring the thing to be inspected, or applying to it at once some crucial test. When testimony or evidence is to be taken and examined, it is not inspection in any sense whatever.' People v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 107 U. S. 59. Laws for the purpose are applied to articles of domestic produce and manufacture for domestic use, to those intended for exportation as well as those imported for consumption at home. Clintsmen v. Northrop, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 46; 1 Story Const., § 1017; 11 AM. AND ENG. ENCYC. OF LAW [1st ed.] 234, note 11."

In Neilson v. Garza, 2 Woods (U. S.) 287, 17

Fed. Cas. No. 10,091, Bradley, J., said: "Bouvier defines inspection as the examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce. Law Dict., verb. Inspection. The removal or destruction of unsound articles is undoubtedly, says Chief Justice Marshall, an exercise of that power. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 419; Story on the Const., § 1024. 'The object of the inspection laws,' says Justice Sutherland, 'is to protect the community, so far as they apply to domestic sales, from frauds and impositions; and, in relation to articles designed for exportation, to preserve the character and reputation of the state in foreign markets.' *Clintsmen v. I. TRIAL BY INSPECTION UNDER EARLY ENGLISH PRACTICE.—In former times the English courts of common law might, if they saw fit, try by inspection or examination, without the aid of a jury, the question of the infancy or the identity of a party; or, on an appeal of mayhem, the issue of mayhem or no mayhem; and in an action of trespass for mayhem, or for an atrocious battery, might, after a verdict for the plaintiff, and on his motion, and upon their own inspection of the wound, super visum vulneris, increase the damages at their discretion. In each of those exceptional cases it was not thought necessary to summon a jury to decide it, because it was considered that the fact, from its nature, must be evident to the court.¹ This, as a distinct method of trial, has long been disused.² Other exceptional instances in which the English courts recognize the right of inspection and physical examination will be found in other sections of this article.³

II. IN ACTIONS FOR PERSONAL INJURIES — 1. When Not Authorized by Statute — a. VIEW THAT NO POWER EXISTS TO COMPEL SUBMISSION TO EXAMINATION — In England. — So far as the books show, no order to inspect the body of a party in a personal action appears to have been made or even moved for in any English courts of common law at any period of their history.⁴

In the United States. — In the United States the decisions are very conflicting on the question whether a court has the power to compel the suitor in an action for personal injuries to submit his person to an examination and inspection at the instance of the opposite party where there is no statute expressly authorizing this practice, and decisions even in the same states are not always harmonious. In the federal courts it is well settled that a court has no power at any time or under any circumstances to compel a plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to submit his person to a physical examination;⁵ and the same rule has been laid down in some of the state courts.⁶ It has also been held that the introduction by the plaintiff, upon the trial of an action for personal injuries, of the testimony of expert witnesses who had examined him

Unreasonable Refusal to Show Injuries. — Though it is denied that the court has power to compel a party to show his injuries, it is held that if he unreasonably refuses to do so when requested, that fact may be considered by the jury as bearing upon his good faith, as in any other case of the party declining to produce the best evidence in his power. Union Pac. Bridwell, 119 Ind. 227, 12 Am. St. Rep. 409, where the court, without expressly deciding that a physical examination could not be ordered in any case, held that where, in an action by an unmarried woman for slander, it was alleged that the defendant had spoken of the plaintiff that she was a whore, and had become pregnant, and had suffered an abortion to be procured upon her, the defendant was not entitled, under a plea of justification, to an order requiring the plaintiff to submit her person to an examination by medical experts.

Texas. — Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Pendery, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 60, following Union Pac. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250.

In the earlier Texas decisions, Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Norfleet, 78 Tex. 321, and International, etc., R. Co. v. Underwood, 64 Tex. 463, which have been frequently cited as sustaining the view that a court has power in a proper case to compel the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to submit to a personal examination, the question was not decided. In the second of these cases it was merely held that the cause would not be reversed for the refusal to order an examination, in the absence of a showing that it was necessary for a full presentation of the facts; and in the first it was held that the court did not err in refusing to compel the plaintiff to be examined by the one physician to whom he expressed an objection, although this objection did not affect the competency or the integrity of the physician proposed.

as to his condition at the time of such examination does not constitute a waiver by him of the privacy of his person or affect the inability of the court to compel his physical examination in the absence of statutory authorization.¹

b. VIEW THAT COURTS MAY COMPEL SUBMISSION TO EXAMINATION. — The decided weight of authority is against the rule stated in the preceding sections. In a number of decisions it is held that in an action to recover for personal injuries the court has power to require the plaintiff to submit to examination by physicians or surgeons for the purpose of ascertaining the nature, extent, and permanency of the injuries for which a recovery is sought,² and that the examination should be ordered and had under the direction and control of the court whenever it fairly appears that the ends of justice require the disclosure or more certain ascertainment of facts which can be brought to light or fully elucidated only by such an examination, and that the examination may be made without danger to the plaintiff's life or health, and without the infliction of serious pain.³ In support of this view it has been urged that when a person appeals to the sovereign for justice he impliedly consents to the doing of justice to the other party and impliedly agrees in advance to make any disclosure which is necessary in order that justice may be done;⁴ that a party to an action has the right to demand the administration of exact justice, and to this end that evidence essential thereto and within the control of the court shall be produced;⁵ that it is within the power of the court to compel an examination, since the plaintiff is before it as a witness;⁶ that if the plaintiff can exhibit his injuries to the jury for the purpose of determining their nature and extent (which it is well settled he can do), he should, in a Finlayson*, 16 Neb. 578, 49 Am. Rep. 724; Ellsworth v. Fairbury, 41 Neb. 881), that it was within the power of the court to make such an order. "In each case, however, the court disclaimed the intention of deciding the question. It was not necessary in either of those cases, and it is not necessary here. The record shows that the application was made during the trial. If the court was not justified on other grounds in overruling the motion, it was justified in doing so because of the time when the motion was made. If such an application is proper under any circumstances, it must be made before trial."

proper case and under proper circumstances, be required to do the same thing for a like purpose upon the request of the other party.¹ It has also been said that the right to a physical examination of the plaintiff upon the defendant's request rests upon the analogy which the proceeding bears to the discovery of books and papers.² This doctrine is, of course, denied in jurisdictions where it is held that the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries cannot be compelled to submit to a physical examination.³

2. Statutory Authorization to Compel Submission to Examination. — In some states statutes have been passed authorizing the courts to compel the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries to submit to a physical examination.⁴ Such statutes, it has been held, do not violate any of the express or implied restraints upon the legislative power to be found in the federal or state constitutions.⁵

3. Discretion of Court as to Making Order for Examination. — In jurisdictions where the power to order a physical examination is upheld the defendant cannot, in any case, demand a physical examination as a matter of right. The application is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court,⁶ which will not be interfered with on appeal except where it has been manifestly abused.⁷ And the refusal of the court to order an examination of the plaintiff will not be presumed to have been made on the ground of a want of power in the court to make the order, but, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, on the ground that under the circumstances the order ought not to have been granted.¹ Nevertheless, the appellate court has ample power to review the exercise of the trial court's discretion, and correct it in case of abuse,² and a refusal to grant an order for inspection and examination when the circumstances present a reasonably clear case for the examination is considered such an abuse of the discretion lodged in the trial court as will operate to reverse a judgment in the plaintiff's favor.³

Denial of Application — When Not Ground for Reversal. — The refusal of an order for a physical examination will not be ground for reversal if it appears that opportunity for such examination was afforded during the trial. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Norfleet, 78 Tex. 324.

Person of Nervous Temperament. — The mere fact that the plaintiff was of a nervous temperament or in a nervous condition was held not a tenable objection to an order for a physical examination, especially where the plaintiff had contracted the opium habit, which without hurt to her could have been utilized to allay nervousness. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hill, 90 Ala. 79, 24 Am. St. Rep. 764.

4. Application for Order for Examination — Time of Making Application. — As regards the time of applying for an order for a physical examination of the plaintiff, the application ought to be so made as not unnecessarily to prolong the trial or to prejudice the plaintiff in proving his case.⁴ While one court has held it not a sufficient ground to deny an application that it was made after the trial was commenced and the jury sworn,⁵ the weight of authority is to the effect that the application should be made before trial, and a sufficient time before trial that the examination may be deliberately and carefully made without interfering with the progress of the proceeding.⁶ It has accordingly been held that the application should be denied when not made until after the close of the plaintiff's evidence;⁷ and an application was also refused when made only one day before the date set for trial.⁸

Good Faith of Application — How Determined. — The question whether the application is made in good faith is to be determined by a reference to the affidavit and the circumstances which characterize the purposes of the applicant in making it; and if the affidavit meets the requirement of the statute, something quite substantial and satisfactory must be shown in order to defeat its efficiency for the purpose sought.⁹

5. What Must Be Shown to Entitle Party to Order — Examination Must Be Indispensable. — To authorize the granting of an order for a physical examination it must be shown that knowledge of necessary and material facts can be acquired only by such examination,¹⁰ and the right to the order, being founded on necessity, will not extend beyond the necessities of the case.¹ In no case will the order be granted merely for the purpose of obtaining cumulative evidence² or where the injuries complained of are so patent as to be apparent to all.³

Unwillingness to Submit to Examination. — It must always be made to appear that the plaintiff is unwilling to submit to an examination; in no case should the order be granted when the party is willing to be examined by competent and disinterested persons.⁴

6. Selection, Qualification, Number, and Status of Examiners — Selection of Physicians. — The physicians to conduct the examination should either be agreed upon by the parties or selected by the court;⁵ and in one case it has been said that it would be better that a physician should be selected by the court, rather than by one or both of the parties.⁶ The parties should, at least, have an equal opportunity of having qualified witnesses present at the examination.⁷ The court should never order an examination by physicians in the employ of the defendant⁸ or chosen by the defendant;⁹ nor should an examination by a physician who has already testified adversely to the plaintiff be directed.¹⁰ It has also been held that the court will not compel the plaintiff to submit to examination by a physician personally obnoxious to him, and that it is immaterial that the objection does not go to the competency or integrity of the physician.¹¹

Qualification of Physicians. — The physicians appointed to conduct the examination should possess the skill and qualifications requisite to an intelligent performance of that duty.¹²

Number of Physicians. — The court will not order an examination of the plaintiff by a greater number of experts than is actually necessary to an intelligent and thorough examination of the injuries complained of.¹³

3. Order Not Granted when Injuries Patent. — Belle of Nelson Distilling Co. v. Riggs, (Ky. 1898) 45 S. W. Rep. 99.

Distinction Between Patent and Latent Injuries. — An injury to the spine is latent, and can be verified or disproved only by means of an examination by experts, skilled in human anatomy and in medical science. It is not like the case of a loss of a limb, which is apparent, and can be seen by the jury at the trial. Hess v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 565.

4. Party Must Be Unwilling to Submit to Examination. — International, etc., R. Co. v. Underwood, 64 Tex. 463; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Norfleet, 78 Tex. 321.

5. Physicians Selected by Court or by Agreement of Parties. — Stuart v. Havens, 17 Neb. 215; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Berling, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 544; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Johnson, 72 Tex. 95.

9. Physicians Chosen by Defendant. — Sioux City, etc., R. Co. v. Finlayson, 16 Neb. 578, 49 Am. Rep. 724.

10. Physicians Who Have Testified Adversely to Plaintiff. — Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Berling, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 544.

Reason for Rule. — "Where * * * experts are called by a party and permitted to make a personal examination of the person injured, and to testify therefrom, there is danger that they will feel under obligations to the party calling them, and, however honest they may be, color their testimony somewhat in its interest, while in many if not most cases their general views upon the question will be known to the party producing them before they are called. In any event, the evidence partakes somewhat of a partisan character." Stuart v. Havens, 17 Neb. 214.

Examination of Females by Female Physicians. — The New York code provision authorizing physical examinations in actions for personal injuries provides that females shall be examined by female physicians. Lawrence v. Samuels, (Supm. Ct. App. T.) 20 Misc. (N. Y.) 280.

11. Physicians Personally Obnoxious to Plaintiff. — Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Johnson, 72 Tex. 95.

12. Qualifications of Examiners. — Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Thul, 29 Kan. 466, 44 Am. Rep. 659, 10 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 783.

13. Number of Physicians. — Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Thul, 29 Kan. 466, 44 Am. Rep. 659; Shepard v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 85 Mo. 635, 55 Am. Rep. 390, wherein the court refused to order an examination by three physicians.

Status of Physician. — A physician appointed to make an examination is an officer of the court and should be sworn.¹

7. Manner of Conducting Examination. — The examination should be made under such restrictions and directions as may seem proper to the court.² The plaintiff should not be subjected to any unnecessary annoyance or exposure of the person.³ The examination should be so conducted as to avoid the infliction of pain, the subjection to indignity, or the endangering of health and life;⁴ and where the test is such that it will be liable to endanger the health of the plaintiff, an application for an order for examination will be refused.⁵ So the court will not require the plaintiff to submit to a painful test.⁶ An order for an examination necessarily involving the use of anæsthetics, opiates, or narcotics will also be refused; there is no obligation on the plaintiff to submit to a test rendering necessary the use of these drugs.⁷

Interrogating Plaintiff as to Condition. — According to one decision, during the physical examination a physician may ask any questions which in his opinion may be necessary to ascertain and report fully upon the nature and extent of the injury complained of;⁸ but in another decision it was held that to interrogate the plaintiff as to his condition and the nature of the injury, or the manner in which it was sustained, thus perhaps eliciting declarations from him which might be used in evidence against him, would be highly improper.⁹

8. Place of Examination. — It is within the sound discretion of the court, depending on the circumstances of each case, whether the examination shall be made in court or out of court.¹⁰

9. Expenses of Examination. — The expenses of the examination should be borne by the party at whose instance it is made.¹¹

10. Effect of Refusal to Obey Order for Examination. — It has been said that a refusal to submit to an examination is a contempt of the court's authority and punishable as such,¹² and in a number of decisions it has either been said or held that on the refusal of the plaintiff to comply with the order when properly made, the court may dismiss the action or refuse to allow the plaintiff to give evidence to establish the injury.¹³ If, in case of a refusal to submit to Dist. 825. See also Schroeder v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 47 Iowa 381, in which case it was said that should such recusancy too long delay the court, or prove an effective obstruction to the progress of the case, the court could have all the allegations as to permanent injury stricken from the pleadings and withdraw from the jury that part of the case.

a proper order for examination, the court should permit the trial to proceed, the fact of such refusal is competent and strong evidence in the defendant's favor;¹ but where the court has refused an order for physical examination because such application was made too late, the fact that the plaintiff has not submitted to an examination is not a circumstance to be considered against him.²

11. Exhibition of Injuries to Jury — a. VOLUNTARY EXHIBITION. — In actions for personal injuries resulting from accident, unskilful treatment by physicians, and the like, it is well established that the court may in its discretion permit the plaintiff to submit his injuries to the view of the jury,³ provided this does not necessitate an exposure so indecent as to be offensive and shocking to feelings of modesty.⁴ The rule does not apply, however, where the legitimate purposes for which such an exhibition may be made are slight and the evident tendency of it is to work improper and illegal results.⁵

b. COMPULSORY EXHIBITION. — In jurisdictions where the view is taken that the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries cannot be compelled to submit to a physical examination by a physician, it is also held that the plaintiff cannot be compelled to submit his injuries to a view of the jury;⁶ but in jurisdictions where the court has power to order an examination of the plaintiff by physicians, it may, in a proper case, direct the plaintiff to exhibit his injuries to the jury, if no indecent exposure is thereby involved.⁷

It has been said of such evidence that it "is of an important and satisfactory nature. It brings before the jury part of the res gesta, and enables them to determine the nature and character of the injury better than to receive it in a secondary way as it must be when described by witnesses." Barker v. Perry, 67

Iowa 146. See also Schroeder v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 47 Iowa 375. To the same effect is the reasoning in Mulhado v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 30 N. Y. 370.

Injury Exhibited Must Not Be Worse than When Inflicted. — Where one was permitted to exhibit to the jury the injury complained of, it having been inflicted by a vicious dog several years before, it was held that such exhibition should have been accompanied by evidence tending to show that no change for the worse had taken place. French v. Wilkinson, 93 Mich. 322.

Injuries to Women — Tendency of Exhibition to Excite Undue Sympathy. — Where the plaintiff was a young and attractive woman, it was held that the exhibition of the injury to the jury was not improper merely because the sympathies of the jury might thereby have been unduly excited in her behalf. Omaha St. R. Co. v. Emminger, 57 Neb. 240.

5. Preservation of Amputated Parts in Alcohol. — Where the foot of a child had been amputated and preserved in a glass jar filled with spirits, the exhibition thereof to the jury was held to be unwarranted and good ground for a new trial, as it might tend to excite the passion and prejudice of the jurors. Rost v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 10 N. Y. App. Div. 477.

7. Contrary View. — Hall v. Manson, 99 Iowa 608; Graves v. Battle Creek, 95 Mich. 266, 35 Am. St. Rep. 561.

Experiments in Court. — Arguing by analogy to those cases which sanction a physical examination of the plaintiff, it is well settled that, under proper circumstances, the court may require the plaintiff to undergo some experiment, or do some physical act, in the presence of the jury, in order to enable the jurors the better to determine what amount of credence to attach to the plaintiff's claim of injury or disability.¹

III. IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS — 1. Examination and Inspection of Defendant's Person. — In England it has been held that a compulsory examination of the person of the defendant in a criminal case cannot be ordered,² and there have been decisions to the same effect in the United States,³ though the contrary has been held.⁴

In Regard to a Comparison of Footprints for the purpose of showing that footprints found at or near the scene of the crime were the defendant's, it is generally held that such a comparison is proper,⁵ though some cases hold that the defendant cannot be compelled to exhibit his feet to the jury, try on shoes, or make footprints for the purpose of such comparison, because it would be compelling him to give evidence against himself.⁶

2. Examination and Inspection of Person of Witness. — In a criminal prosecution for an assault, it has been held that the prosecuting witness may exhibit his injuries to the jury,⁷ and also that he may be compelled to do so at the instance of the defendant.⁸ On the other hand, it has been held that the defendant in a rape case cannot insist, as a matter of right, that the prosecuting witness shall submit to an examination of her person by medical experts, and that if such examination can be compelled in any case it is a matter of judicial discretion and not revisable.⁹

3. Determination of Age by Inspection. — According to some decisions the personal appearance of a party or witness cannot be considered by the court or jury as evidence in determining the question of the age of such party or witness.¹⁰ The contrary view has been taken, however, in other decisions.¹¹

4. Power to Order Compulsory Examination Asserted in United States. — State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79, 33 Am. Rep. 530, holding that where a question was raised as to the identity of the defendant he might be compelled to exhibit his arm to the jury in order to determine whether it bore certain marks as testified to by a witness.

In Iowa this question has not been expressly decided, but it was held that the examination could not be said to be compulsory where the only evidence of compulsion was that the sheriff accompanied the physician who made the examination, it not being shown that the sheriff said or did anything in respect of the examination. State v. Struble, 71 Iowa 11.

5. Comparison of Footprints — General Rule. — State v. Prudhomme, 25 La. Ann. 523. See also the title IDENTITY, vol. 15, p. 923.

6. Comparison of Footprints, etc., Held Improper.

— In Day v. State, 63 Ga. 667, it was held that evidence that a witness forcibly placed the defendant's foot in certain tracks near the scene of the burglary, and that they were of the same size, was not admissible, because a defendant cannot be compelled to criminate himself by acts or words.

In People v. Mead, 50 Mich. 228, it was held that the defendant could not be required, against objection, to try on a shoe to determine whether tracks found at the scene of the offense were his own.

In Stokes v. State, 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 619, 30 Am. Rep. 72, it was held improper for the prosecuting attorney to place a pan of soft earth in front of the jury and then request the defendant to make a footprint in it.

4. Inspection of Infant in Filiation Cases. — In a number of cases it has been held that in prosecutions for bastardy the child may be exhibited to the jury for the purpose of comparison with the supposed father and to determine whether there is a family resemblance.¹ In another decision it was denied that such practice was permissible;² and on a prosecution for seduction it was held error to allow an infant three months old, alleged to be the fruit thereof, to be exhibited to the jury to corroborate the prosecutrix by reason of the supposed resemblance between the child and the father.³

Where the Legitimacy of a Child Was in Issue, the claim having been made that it was of mixed blood, it was held competent to permit the child to be shown to the jury as the jurors were as well qualified as any one else to judge whether it was or was not of pure white blood.⁴

IV. IN PROCEEDINGS FOR DIVORCE — 1. Power of Courts to Order Inspection and Examination. — It is well settled both in England and America that in proceedings for divorce where the impotency of a party is in question the court has power to order an examination of the person of the party alleged to be impotent, and, if the exigencies of the case require it, of the party instituting the proceedings.⁵ The court must necessarily have some discretion in the matter of ordering an examination,⁶ and it will be denied if the court has good reason to doubt the good faith and sincerity of the party making the application.⁷

Old Persons. — The court will act with much greater hesitancy in the case of an old person than of a young one.⁸

Where a Woman Has Submitted Herself to the Examination of Competent Surgeons, whose testimony can be readily obtained, it has been held that the court will not order her to submit to another examination.⁹

Triennial Cohabitation. — It was formerly held that in a suit for nullity of marriage by reason of impotency the courts would not order an inspection unless there had been a triennial cohabitation,¹⁰ but this is certainly not the rule now.¹¹

2. How Examination Conducted. — The appointment of inspectors and the determination of their number seem to be wholly matters of judicial discretion.¹²

9. Where Party Has Already Submitted to Examination. — Devanbagh v. Devanbagh, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 554, 28 Am. Dec. 443. Compare Newell v. Newell, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 25, where it was held that in a suit to annul a marriage on the ground of the physical incapacity of the defendant, if the answer admits the present incapacity, but denies that it existed at the time of the marriage, and the nature of the incapacity is such as to render a surgical examination of the defendant necessary, in connection with a personal examination on oath as to the commencement and progress of the disease which has created the incapacity, the court will direct the defendant to submit to such examination, although she has been previously examined ex parte and without oath by her own medical attendants.

10. View that Triennial Cohabitation Was Necessary. — Aleson v. Aleson, 2 Lee Ecc. 576.

11. The Contrary View. — See the cases cited in the first note in this section.

12. Discretion of Court. — 2 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce (6th ed.), § 597.

In the leading American case on the subject the court ordered a reference to a master to take proof of the facts and circumstances stated in the bill, directed an examination of the defendant, and ordered that no person should be present at the examination except the surgeons and matrons selected by the master, unless with the consent of the party to be examined;¹ and in another decision the court appointed a commissioner to take proofs, to select the examiners, and to prescribe such rules as would insure a fair examination.² In each of these cases the order further directed a report of all the proceedings had before the referee or commissioner, together with the evidence of the inspectors as to the facts and results of the examination.

3. Methods of Enforcing Order. — If the complainant refuses to submit to an examination, the bill may be dismissed,³ or the order for the examination may be enforced by an attachment,⁴ or the party may be proceeded against for contempt;⁵ and where the defendant was a woman and out of the jurisdiction it was directed that the allowance for alimony be suspended until she consented to the examination.⁶

4. Expenses of Examination. — In the only case where any question as to the expenses of the examination seems to have been raised, the complainant in the case being the husband, it was held that he must furnish the necessary funds to pay the expenses of the examination of the defendant.⁷

V. WRIT DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO — In Criminal Cases. — The writ de ventre inspiciendo to ascertain whether a woman convicted of a capital crime was quick with child, was allowed by the common law in order to guard against taking the life of an unborn child for the crime of the mother.⁸ This writ has rarely been resorted to in America.⁹ The usual practice, it seems, is for the examination to be made by a jury of twelve matrons,¹⁰ but in case they were in doubt they might, with the permission of the court, call in an experienced and skilled surgeon to aid them in the examination.¹¹

In Matters of Civil Right the writ was allowed to protect the rightful succession to the property of a deceased person against fraudulent claims of bastards, when a widow was supposed to feign herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate, in which case the heir or devisee might have this writ to examine whether she was with child, and, if she was, to keep her under proper restraint until delivered.¹² This writ was said to be of common right¹³ and has been issued in England in quite recent times,¹⁴ but there is no "instance of its ever having been considered in any part of the United States as suited to the habits and condition of the people."¹⁵

INSTANT—INSTANTLY. (See also FORTHWITH, vol. 13, p. 1157; IMMEDIATE—IMMEDIATELY, vol. 15, p. 1020.)—See note 3.

INSTANTANEOUS.—Instantaneous means done or occurring in an instant or without any perceptible duration of time; as, the passage of electricity appears to be instantaneous.⁴

1. Instalment.—By a bill of sale goods were assigned as security for the repayment of five hundred pounds and interest thereon at the rate of sixty pounds per cent. per annum, and the grantor agreed to pay "the principal sum aforesaid, with the interest then due, by twelve equal monthly payments of forty-one pounds, thirteen shillings, fourpence, * * * until the whole of the said sum and interest shall be fully paid," and that "in default of payment of any instalment" then the grantor would pay interest thereon at the rate aforesaid from the date when such instalment should become due until full payment thereof. The grantor also agreed (inter alia) to insure the assigned goods, and pay all premiums, and that upon default the grantee might do so and charge the costs thereof, with interest at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, to the grantor, and that the same should be considered to be included in the security, and that the grantee might pay all rent, rates, and taxes at any time due in respect of the message in which the goods might be, and that thereupon all such payments made by the grantee, together with the interest at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum, should be charged on the goods, which should not be redeemed until full payment of all such sums and interest. It was held that upon the true construction of the bill of sale, interest upon interest was not reserved, but that the word instalment referred only to the monthly payments of principal. Goldstrom v. Tallerman, 18 Q. B. D. 1.

2. Instances.—The term instances has been held to mean specified cases; enumerated cases. Padelford v. Savannah, 14 Ga. 477. This case was upon the construction of that passage of the ratification of the Constitution of the United States by the Virginia convention which reads as follows: "That, therefore, no right, of any denomination, can be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the Congress; by the Senate or House of Representatives, acting in any capacity; by the President; or any department or officer of the United States, except in those instances in which power is given, by the Constitution, for those purposes," etc.

3. Instant.—An instant is not to be considered in law, as in logic, a point of time and no parcel of time. By intendment of law it may be divided and applied to several purposes. Jackson v. Eddy, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 601.

Instant Acceptance.—Where a telegram making an offer demanded an instant acceptance, but was not received until ten o'clock on Saturday night, and the answer was delayed until Monday, the delay was held unreasonable and the acceptance not binding. James v. Marion Fruit Jar, etc., Co., 69 Mo. App. 207.

Inquisition of Coroner's Jury.—The time of death is not sufficiently set out in an inquisition of a coroner's jury that, after describing the cause of the death and the nature of the injuries sustained by the deceased, proceeds: "Of which, etc., the said A B * * * instantly died." Lord Denman, C. J., said: "The time when the death took place is not pointed out with sufficient accuracy and precision; the words are, 'of which blow, shock, and concussion the deceased instantly died.' And on this point it was contended that the word instantly was equivalent to the words 'then and there.' 'Then' or ad tunc involves the precise time at which the accident happened, something done at the same time and moment. Instantly means some time after, that is, instantly upon, and immediately following, but not at the same moment. But the word instantly is not sufficient, and the words instantly and incontinenter, according to the whole course of precedents, do not dispense with the words ad tunc et ibidem." Reg. v. Brownlow, 8 Dowl. 157, 3 Per. & Dav. 52, 11 Ad. & El. 119, 39 E. C. L. 34.

Indictment for Murder.—The indictment in the case of Lester v. State, 9 Mo. 666, alleged that the defendant did inflict divers wounds and contusions on the head of one Scott, of which he, the said Scott, "did instantly die." Napton, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "Here the word instantly seems designed to supply the place of the words 'then and there;' and the attorney-general insists that both in its popular and proper legal acceptation it will embrace everything which is conveyed by those words. This may be true so far as time is concerned, but in capital cases it has been thought expedient to require great strictness, and it would be difficult to foresee to what extent innovations would go, if we lose sight of the established precedents, so far as they fix the form of material averments." See also State v. Lakey, 65 Mo. 218; State v. Sides, 64 Mo. 383.

Reasonable Time.—A bill of sale provided for redemption if the plaintiff should instantly on demand pay the sum due. It was held that what was contemplated by this was a demand and reasonable time for complying with it. Massey v. Sladen, L. R. 4 Exch. 13.

4. Instantaneous Death.—In Sawyer v. Perry, 88 Me. 48, the court, after giving the definition in the text, said that "while other courts and some writers of text books have used indis-

INSTIGATE. (See generally the title AIDER AND ABETTOR, vol. 2, p. 29.)—Instigate means to stimulate or goad to an action, especially to a bad action. One of its synonyms is to abet.³

INSTITUTE.—See note 4.

INSTITUTION. (See also the title EXEMPTIONS (FROM TAXATION), vol. 12, p. 266.)—The term "institution" is sometimes used as descriptive of the criminally the words instantaneous and 'immediate,' and the adverbs instantaneously and 'immediately,' we have not regarded them, in this class of cases, as meaning precisely the same thing, and have preferred to use the words 'immediate' and 'immediately,' as being more comprehensive and elastic in their meaning than the words instantaneous and instantaneously, and better calculated to convey the idea which we wish to express. Of course an instantaneous death is an immediate death, but we have not supposed that an immediate death is necessarily, and in all cases, an instantaneous death." See also the title DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT, vol. 8, p. 851.

1. Instanter—Procedure.—"The term instanter means, it is said, that the act shall be done within twenty-four hours (Price v. Simpson, 1 Taunt. 343; Tidd 567, 641, 674); but a doubt has been suggested by whom the account of hours is to be kept, and whether the term instanter, as applied to the subject-matter, may not more properly be taken to mean 'before the rising of the court,' when the act is to be done in court; or 'before the shutting of the office on the same night,' when the act is to be done there. Tidd 567, 641; Rex v. Johnson, 6 East 587, note." 3 Chitty's Pr. 111. The New York courts have adopted the former of these meanings. Champlin v. Champlin, 2 Edw. (N. Y.) 328; Jackson v. Eddy, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 601; Harman v. Glover, 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 617; Sabin v. Johnson, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 421. And so in Missouri, State v. Clevenger, 20 Mo. App. 627; and in Colorado, Moffat v. Dikson, 3 Colo. 315. But the Illinois courts have adopted the latter. Northrop v. McGee, 20 Ill. App. 108; Montague v. Hanchett, 20 Ill. App. 226.

In Smith v. Little, 53 Ill. App. 160, it was said: "The order was that the defendants plead instanter. This was assumed to mean instantly. Technically, however, it means within the judicial day then begun. 1 Bouv. Law Dict. 645. It is probably true that the term, as ordinarily used, is understood to mean instantly, immediately, or at once, so that upon such a rule a default may follow the entry of the rule, and this, in effect, makes the rule unnecessary, for the default might as well be entered without it."

Same—Bail Bond.—In Fentress v. State, 16 Tex. 79, the bail bond was conditioned as follows: "Now, if the said Rainey Fentress shall make his personal appearance before the District Court of Bexar county to answer to said indictment instanter, to be holden in the town of San Antonio, A. D. 1882, there to remain until discharged by the court," etc. It was held sufficient as to both place and time, the term instanter having a legal signification, and usually meaning within the next twenty-four hours, and when not so meaning, signifying "within a reasonable time."

2. Instead Of.—Laws N. Y. 1853, c. 245, § 1, provided as follows: "Instead of the toll authorized to be demanded and received on plank-roads by section 35 of chapter 210 of the Laws of 1847, the following rates of toll may hereafter be demanded and received," etc. In a case arising under this section the court said: "The term instead of means in the place or room of; and the plain intent of the legislature was to supersede section 35 by section 1; and the result was that section 35 was repealed by implication. The intent could not have been more patent had that section read that section 35 is hereby amended so as to read as follows." Southport Plank Road Co. v. Russell, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 7 N. Y. St. Rep. 506. See generally the title TURNPIKES.

3. State v. Fraker, 148 Mo. 143. And in that case it was held that the beneficiary in an insurance policy could not be said to have instigated his executor in an attempt to defraud the insurance company by his prior acts in obtaining the policy, executing a will, and pretending to drown.

4. Institute—Commence.—An English statute provided that no prosecution should be instituted for any offense under the Sunday Act, except with the consent of the chief of police. In construing this statute in Thorpe v. Priestnall, (1897) 1 Q. B. 162, the court said: "It is clear that the institution of a prosecution is something which may be done by the chief constable as well as with his consent. The chief constable cannot grant a summons, nor, when a summons is once granted, has he any discretion to exercise as to whether it shall be served or not. Neither of those things, therefore, is the institution of the prosecution, which is a matter within his discretion. The institution of the prosecution must, therefore, be the laying of the information. I do not think that any distinction can properly be drawn between the words institute and 'commence.' The passages in the judgments in Yates v. Reg., 14 Q. B. D. 648, which were relied upon in support of the conviction, only amount to dicta, for the decision in that case related to a prosecution for libel by a criminal information filed by order of the court."

Instituting and Bringing.—In Com. v. Duane, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 608, it was said: "For, without entering into a critical examination of the meaning of the word institute, in common parlance, when applied to legal proceedings, it signifies the commencement of the proceed-establishment or place where the business of a society or association is done or its operations are carried on, and at other times it is used to designate the organized body.¹

ing. When we talk of instituting an action, we understand bringing an action."

Art Institute. — See ART, vol. 2, p. 943.

Implying Incorporation. — So in Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 100, it was said: "The words institution and 'organized' appear to imply an incorporation. A private school or college may by courtesy be called an institution according to the American fashion of promoting people and things by brevet names. But in legal parlance an institution implies foundation by law, by enactment or prescription. One may open and keep a private school; he cannot be properly said to institute it."

Institution in the Sense of the Organization. — In Nobles County v. Hamline University, 46 Minn. 316, the act considered provided that "all corporate property belonging to the institution, both real and personal, is and shall be free from taxation;" and to the claim that only "the university itself and the necessary grounds for its proper use" were exempt, the court replied as follows: "The * * * proposition is based upon an untenable attempted distinction between the institution and the 'corporation.' * * * The term institution, although sometimes used as descriptive of the establishment or place where a business is carried on, properly means an association or society organized or established for promoting some specific purpose. * * * The institution, as distinguished from the 'corporation,' has no being, and is incapable of owning property. Had it been intended to limit the exemption to property directly used and occupied by the university, different language would have been used." And see also Montana Catholic Missions v. Lewis County, 13 Mont. 565.

Upon a statute exempting charitable institutions from taxation, the court in Kentucky Female Orphan School v. Louisville, 100 Ky. 486, said: "Upon the whole, it would seem that when the statute exempts the institution from taxation, and no qualifying words are used showing or tending to show that only the property 'used' by the institution or 'connected' with the institution is to be exempt, then the associated entity — the corporate being — with its estate as an entirety, is embraced by the word institution. The exemption of the institution would thus embrace its endowment fund and property, in whatever form these assets might be found. This is precisely what we find in the section under consideration, so far as reference is made to 'institutions of purely public charity.'"

In the Sense of Establishment. — In Richmond County v. Bohler, 80 Ga. 161, it was said: "That the word institution, both in legal and colloquial use, admits of application to physical things, cannot be questioned. One of its meanings, as defined in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, is, 'an establishment, especially of a public character, affecting a community.' And one of the meanings of 'establishment,' as defined by the same authority, is 'the place in which one is permanently fixed for residence or business; residence with grounds, furniture, equipage, etc., with which one is fitted out; also, any office or place of business, with its fixtures.'" And in that case it was held that in an exemption statute the word was used in the sense of the establishment of the society and not as meaning the organization itself.

In Morris v. Lone Star Chapter No. 6, 68 Tex. 701, it was said: "The grammatical construction of this provision is not clear. The word institution properly means an association organized or established for some specific purpose (see the word in Webster's Dictionary), though it is sometimes used in statutes and in common parlance in the sense of the building or establishment in which the business of such a society is carried on." And in that case it was held that the word in the exemption statute was used in the latter sense. See also Montgomery v. Wyman, 130 Ill. 22; Appeal Tax Ct. v. St. Peter's Academy, 50 Md. 345.

Exemption. — The exemption from income tax granted by the English Income Tax Act of 1842 (Sched. A, § 61, No. VI.) to any building "the property of any literary or scientific institution," includes buildings appropriated to free public libraries and used solely for the purposes of the libraries, whoever may be the owners of the buildings, and whether they are or are not supported by rates. Manchester v. McAdam, (1860) A. C. 500.

System. — In Manchester v. McAdam, (1896) A. C. 507, Lord Herschell said: "It may be well to consider, first, what is the meaning of the word institutions as used in the section. It is a word employed to express several different ideas. It is sometimes used in a sense in which the institution cannot be said to consist of any persons, or body of persons, who could, strictly speaking, own property. The essential idea conveyed by it in connection with such adjectives as 'literary' and 'scientific' is often no more than a system, scheme, or arrangement by which literature or science is promoted, without reference to the persons with whom the management may rest, or in whom the property appropriated for these purposes may be vested, save in so far as these may be regarded as a part of such system, scheme, or arrangement. That is certainly a well-recognized meaning of the word. One of the definitions contained in the Imperial Dictionary is as follows: 'A system, plan, or society, established either by law or by the authority of individuals, for promoting any object, public or social.'"

Transient Organization. — By the term institution is to be understood an organization which is permanent in its nature, as contradistinguished from an undertaking which is transient and temporary. Indianapolis v. Sturdevant, 24 Ind. 391; Humphries v. Little Sisters of Poor, 29 Ohio St. 201.

INSTRUCTIONS. (See also the title INSTRUCTIONS, 11 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 47.)—An instruction is an exposition of the principles of law, applicable to a case or some branch or phase of a case, which the jury is bound to apply in order to render a verdict establishing the rights of the parties in accordance with the facts proven.¹ In common parlance an instruction is an order or direction.²

INSTRUMENT. (See also the titles FORGERY, vol. 13, pp. 1086, 1093; LIMITATION OF ACTIONS; RECORDING ACTS; and see WRITING.)—The term "instrument," in its broadest sense, comprises formal or legal documents in writing, including contracts, deeds, wills, bonds, leases, mortgages, etc. In the law of evidence it has still a wider meaning, and includes not merely documents, but witnesses, and things animate or inanimate, which may be presented for inspection.³

A Bequest to a Benevolent, Religious, Charitable Institution was held void, as by force of the term "benevolent" it embraced objects which were not legal charities. It was contended by counsel that the term institution gave definiteness to the expression of the use intended, but the court said: "An institution is a mere organism for the accomplishment of an object, and the existence of such organism cannot, in the nature of things, make such object definite. To make the argument of any value it should appear that the class of benevolent purposes which are not comprehended in the definition of legal charities are not and cannot be executed by institutions, that is, associations of persons." Thomson v. Norris, 20 N. J. Eq. 524.

1. Instructions.—Lehman v. Hawks, 121 Ind. 541.

In Lawler v. McPheeters, 73 Ind. 579, it was said: "Instructions proper are directions in reference to the law of the case."

Writing.—Within the meaning of a statute requiring that instructions shall be in writing, it has been held that an instruction is an announcement to the jury by the court of the rules of law, which it is the duty of the jury to apply from the facts it may find from the evidence before it. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 50 Ill. App. 209, affirmed 149 Ill. 525.

In McCallister v. Mount, 73 Ind. 507, the court said: "A direction to retire with their bailiff; to separate for their meals; to seal up their verdict; to abstain from talking among themselves or with others; to sign their general verdict, or to answer interrogatories, are not instructions within the meaning of the law."

Same — Interrogatories.—In Trentman v. Wiley, 85 Ind. 33, a direction given to the jury in regard to interrogatories was held not to be an instruction and therefore was not required to be in writing.

Same — Directing Jury to Retire After Informal Verdict.—In Lehman v. Hawks, 121 Ind. 541, it was held, where a proper request was made that all the instructions to the jury should be given in writing, and all the instructions given before the jury retired were in writing, and afterwards the jury returned with an informal verdict, and the court orally directed the jury to retire and bring in a verdict covering the issues of the case, that the court committed no error in making such oral statement; that it was not an instruction in the true sense of the word.

Same — Oral Statement as to Evidence.—In Stanley v. Sutherland, 54 Ind. 354, the court was requested to instruct the jury in writing before any evidence was introduced. The defendant introduced certain evidence, to which the plaintiff objected, and the court said to the jury: "Gentlemen of the jury, I instruct you that this evidence will have no bearing on the case unless the plaintiff is connected with it in some way, or the facts brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff." It was held that such statement to the jury did not constitute an instruction within the meaning of the statute requiring that instructions be given in writing.

2. Instructions — Building Contract. (See also the title WORKING CONTRACTS.)—A company contracted with a builder to do the work of a building "in a substantial and workmanlike manner" and "in accordance with the plans, specifications, and instructions furnished" by the company. It was held that the word instructions referred to the kind of structure, etc., relating to planning the building, but the mode of accomplishing the work was left to the builder's own skill and judgment. Hunt v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 51 Pa. St. 475.

Instruction and Regulation Distinguished.—"Section 251 [Rev. Stat. U. S.], which empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to issue regulations for the government of collectors, makes a distinction between instructions and 'regulations.' This distinction is inherent in the nature of the two things. An instruction is a direction to govern the conduct of the particular officer to whom it is addressed. A regulation affects a class or classes of officers." Landram's Case, 16 Ct. Cl. 85.

3. Instrument.—Cardenas v. Miller, 108 Cal. 250.

"Abbott, in his law dictionary, defines the word instrument as 'something reduced to writing as a means of evidence,' and Webster describes it as a writing expressive of 'some act, contract, process, or proceeding, as a deed, contract, writ,' etc." State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 34.

In Foarman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, it was said that an instrument is a writing that contains some agreement, and is said to be so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes conveyances, leases, mortgages, bonds, promissory notes, wills, etc.

A generic term for bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, wills, and like formal or solemn writings. It scarcely includes accounts, letters in ordinary correspondence, memoranda, and similar writings, with respect to which the creation of evidence to bind the party or the establishment of an obligation or title is not the primary motive. Abbott's L. Dict.; Hankinson v. Page, 31 Fed. Rep. 186.

Recording Acts. — As used in a recording act, the word instrument has been defined to mean "some written paper or instrument signed and delivered by one person to another, transferring the title to or creating a lien on property, or giving a right to a debt or duty." Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564; Warnock v. Harlow, 96 Cal. 307.

Instrument of Conveyance. — In Matter of Potts, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 343, it was said: "When we speak of an 'instrument of conveyance' we use a phrase of the broadest extent. Lexicographers define instrument to be the 'agent or mean of anything.' If, therefore, we suffer the language of our lawgivers to convey the same ideas we derive from language coming from any other source, we have no difficulty in determining that a devise in trust is a 'conveyance in trust,' and that a last will and testament may be an 'instrument of creating a trust.'"

Instrument in the Sense of Written Instrument. — In Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 566, it was said: "In fact the word instrument appears to be used, as suggested by Abbott in his definition of the word (see Abbott's Law Dictionary, word Instrument), as an abbreviated form of 'written instrument,' the word 'written' being elided."

A statute applied to charities which had an instrument of foundation or statutes. In construing this provision Lord Selborne, L. C., said: "Certainly the other words 'instrument of foundation or statutes' point with great distinctness to written instruments." Matter of Endowed Schools Act, 10 App. Cas. 307.

Engravings. — The term instrument, in a forgery statute, has been held to include not only written instruments and writings, but also an engraved or printed instrument, being or purporting to be the act of another. People v. Rhoner, (Supm. Ct.) 4 Park. Crim. (N. Y.) 166; Benson v. McMahon, 127 U. S. 470.

Signature. — As to whether a signature is necessary to constitute an instrument, see Hunter v. Parker, 7 M. & W. 342.

Deed Not Necessary — Mere Writing. — The articles of association of a company permitted the transfer of stock by instruments in writing. It was held that a deed was not necessary. In re Tahiti Cotton Co., L. R. 17 Eq. 273; Ortigosa v. Brown, 47 L. J. Ch. 168.

It was provided that a power might be executed by "deed, instrument, or will." It was held that a mere writing which was neither a deed nor a will was all that was necessary. Boderick v. Brown, 1 Kay & J. 328. But in Conservators v. Inland Revenue Com'rs, 18 Q. B. D. 279, it was held that where a statute provided for stamps on bonds, covenants, or instruments of any kind whatsoever, the term instrument meant an instrument of the same nature as a bond or covenant.

Annexation Proceedings. — In Logansport v.

La Rose, 99 Ind. 117, it was held that the annexation proceedings annexing real estate to a city were not a written instrument within the meaning of the statute providing that it should not be necessary to copy a written instrument into a bill of exception.

By-laws — Instrument. — In re Henderson, 29 Ont. 669, 18 Can. L. T. 362, a by-law was held to be an instrument, but not an instrument capable of registration.

Certificate of Notary Public. — In Rogers v. State, 8 Tex. App. 404, it was held that the fabrication of a certificate of a notary public purporting to authenticate the acknowledgment of a conveyance or transfer was not a forgery of an instrument within the Texas statute which provides that it shall be forgery to make a false instrument which if true would have transferred or in any manner have affected any property whatever, and which further defines an instrument as follows: "By an instrument which would 'have transferred or in any manner have affected' property is meant every species of conveyance or undertaking, in writing, which supposes a right in the person purporting to execute it to dispose of or change the character of property of every kind, and which can have such effect when genuine."

A Judgment Is Not a Written Instrument within the meaning of the Indiana statute which provides as follows: "When any pleading is founded on a written instrument, or on account, the original, or a copy thereof, must be filed with the pleading. * * * Such copy of a written instrument, when not copied in the pleadings, shall be taken as part of the record." The court said: "Deeds, mortgages, bonds, written contracts, promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc., are written instruments. Judgments are in writing, but are not usually called written instruments. The legislature, in framing and enacting the section, evidently had in view only instruments of which 'the original, or a copy,' might be filed, as the party might elect." Lyle v. Lyle, 37 Ind. 281. See also Wilson v. Vance, 55 Ind. 584; Morrison v. Fishel, 64 Ind. 177; Becknell v. Becknell, 110 Ind. 42; Dumbould v. Rowley, 113 Ind. 353.

Letters. (See also the titles LETTERS; SECONDARY EVIDENCE.) — Within a rule that a written instrument must be proved by the instrument itself, the court thus defined instrument in Rose v. Otis, 5 Colo. App. 472: "The word instrument has a technical meaning in law. It is something reduced to writing as a means of evidence. It is the formal expression in writing of some agreement or obligation, or of some act upon which the rights of parties are dependent. Contracts may be made by letter, and when a contract is thus made the letters evidencing it are within the definition of the term; but ordinarily a letter is not a written instrument, and the doctrine as stated would not apply to it. But at the trial of Queen Caroline, in 1820, the rule which obtained in the case of written instruments was applied to letters." The court then went on to say that the rule of Queen Caroline's case has been followed in the United States, citing Stamper v. Griffin, 12 Ga. 450; 1 Greenl. Ev., §§ 88, 463, Jackson v. Jackson, 47 Ga. 99; and held that the writer of a letter could not be questioned as to statements made therein, until the letter itself had been put in evidence.

Lis Pendens.—In Warnock v. Harlow 96 Cal. 301, it was held that a notice of lis pendens was not an instrument within a California statute providing that an unrecorded instrument should be valid as between the parties and those who had notice thereof.

Mortgage.—In Tolman v. Smith, 74 Cal. 345, it was held that a mortgage executed by a married woman upon her separate real estate was an instrument of conveyance, within a statute providing for acknowledgment. See generally the title ACKNOWLEDGMENTS, vol. I. p. 483.

Same—Statute of Limitations.—A suit to foreclose a mortgage has been held to be a suit upon a sealed instrument. Meier v. Kelly, 22 Oregon 136.

Returns of Marriages, Births, Deaths, etc.—A statute provided that the secretary of state and register of the Prerogative Court should be entitled to receive twelve cents for filing every bond or instrument or writing of a public nature. It was held that this did not entitle the secretary of state to charge the state for filing the returns of marriages, births, and deaths, required to be sent to his office. The court said: "It appears that the textual associates of the term 'instrument of writing' are bonds, deeds, records, and laws, and the proposition therefore is, Does this expression, in view of its intrinsic signification and of its relationship in this sentence, have so wide a scope as to embrace every possible paper writing that may be directed by the legislature to be put among the files of this office? Unless the expression 'instrument of writing' has this very extensive import, it will not take in the returns in question, for such returns have no legal character or force, being mere statistical collections deposited in this public office for the purposes of economic science. * * * I cannot construe this language in this broad sense. In my apprehension it has a restrictive connotation from being associated with such things as bonds, laws, deeds, and records; and independently of such surroundings and connections, the expression, standing by itself, would not comprehend all written papers, but only written papers of a class. Abbott, in his Law Dictionary, defines the word instrument as 'something reduced to writing as a means of evidence,' and Webster describes it as a writing expressive of 'some act, contract, process, or proceeding, as a deed, contract, writ,' etc. It has just been shown that these returns do not embrace the contents of any of these definitions; they are not 'reduced to writing as a means of evidence,' nor are they expressive 'of some act, contract, process, or proceeding, as a deed, contract, writ,' etc." State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 33.

Power of Attorney.—A power of attorney to convey real estate is included in the term instrument whereby real estate may be affected. Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234. In Williams v. Birbeck, Hoffm. (N. Y.) 369, it was held that the term included a power of attorney to assign a mortgage. These cases arose under recording acts.

Stenographer's Report.—In Patterson v. Churchman, 122 Ind. 385, a stenographer's report was held not to be a written instrument within a statute providing that it should not be necessary to copy a written instrument into a bill of exceptions. The court said: "We quote from Anderson's Dictionary of Law: 'Instrument * * * (3) Anything reduced to writing; a "written instrument," or "instrument of writing;" more particularly, a document of a formal or solemn character. * * * "Instruments in writing," associated in a statute with "bonds," "laws," "deeds," and "records," have a restrictive connotation. Independently of such surroundings, the expression, by itself, does not comprehend all written papers, but only written papers of a class. An instrument is "something reduced to writing as a means of evidence." Returns of births, marriages, and deaths, to a department of government, are not instruments. A generic term for bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, wills, and like formal or solemn writings. Scarcely includes accounts, letters in ordinary correspondence, memoranda, and similar writings with respect to which the creation of evidence to bind the party, or the establishment of an obligation or title, is not the primary motive." In Bouvier's Law Dictionary the word instrument is defined as follows: "The writing which contains some agreement, and is so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place, or been agreed upon. It includes bills, bonds, conveyances, leases, mortgages, promissory notes, and wills, but scarcely accounts, ordinary letters, or memoranda. The agreement and the instrument in which it is contained are very different things, the latter being only evidence of the former. The instrument or form of the contract may be valid, but a contract itself may be void on account of fraud."

Writing on Back of Note.—The writing "Extended to December 1st, 1891," placed by the payee thereof on a promissory note, has been held a written instrument, importing a consideration. The court said: "A 'written instrument' is defined to be 'something reduced to writing as a means of evidence' (11 AM. AND ENG. ENCYC. OF LAW 275, note); 'a writing expressive of some act' (Webst. Dict.); 'anything reduced to writing' (And. Law Dict.)." Corbett v. Clough, 8 S. Dak. 180.

Forgery—Telegram.—A telegram has been held an instrument. In Reg. v. Riley, (1896) 1 Q. B. 314. Hawkins, J., said: "Now, can this telegram properly be called an instrument? I am not aware of any authority for saying that in law the term instrument has ever been confined to any definite class of legal documents. In the absence of such authority, I cannot but think the term ought to be interpreted according to its generally understood and ordinary meaning, as stated in the dictionaries of Dr. Johnson and of Webster. Both these give definitions first how the word is to be treated when applied to a chattel, namely, as 'a tool used for any work or purpose.' When applied to a writing, Dr. Johnson defines it as 'a writing— a writing containing any contract or order.' Webster's definition is, 'a writing expressive of some act, contract, process, or proceeding.' When used generally, Dr. Johnson speaks of it as 'that by means whereof something is done;' Webster, as 'one who, or that which, is made a means, or caused to serve a purpose.' These definitions cover an infinite variety of writings, whether penned for the purpose of creating binding obligations or as records of business or other transactions."

Verdict. — A statute provided that a creditor should receive interest, when there was no agreement as to rate, at a certain per cent. per annum for all moneys after they became due on bonds, bills, promissory notes, or other instruments of writing. It was held that under this statute interest was not recoverable on a verdict. The court said: "To the first proposition it may be replied that the term 'instrument of writing,' as here used, has a definite legal meaning, which excludes a verdict as something essentially different. An instrument of writing implies an agreement or contract which it contains, and of which it is the memorial. (Bouvier.) A verdict is the unanimous decision made by a jury and reported to the court on the matters lawfully submitted to them in the course of the trial of a cause. (Bouvier.)" Hawley v. Barker, 5 Colo. 120.

A Writ of Attachment Is Not an Instrument within the meaning of section 1107 of the California Code of Civil Procedure, which provides as follows: "Every grant of an estate in real property is conclusive against the grantor, also every one subsequently claiming under him, except a purchaser or incumbrancer who in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, acquires a title or lien by an instrument that is first duly recorded." Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564.

A Sheriff's Certificate of Sale under Section 700 of the California Code of Civil Procedure Is an Instrument within the meaning of section 1107 of that code. (See the preceding paragraph.) The court said: "The question recurs, was the sheriff's certificate of sale, issued to the respondent and recorded, good as against an unrecorded deed? * * * Appellant contends that a sheriff's certificate is not an instrument whereby a title or lien is acquired within the purview of section 1107 of the Civil Code. An instrument is a writing which contains some agreement, and is said to be so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes conveyances, leases, mortgages, bills, bonds, promissory notes, wills, etc. (Bouvier's Law Dictionary.) * * * The sheriff's certificate to the purchaser is the evidence of the equitable interest which the purchaser has in the land, and is an instrument whereby an interest or title is created, within the meaning of section 1107 of the Civil Code." Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, citing Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 301.

Tax Duplicate. — In Hazzard v. Heacock, 39 Ind. 173, it was held that a tax duplicate was not a written instrument within the meaning of a statute requiring that copies of instruments be filed with the pleadings. See also Ewing v. Robeson, 15 Ind. 26.

A Will is an instrument in writing within the meaning of a power to appoint by an "instrument in writing." Sugden on Powers (3d Am. ed.) 262; Smith v. Adkins, L. R. 14 Eq. 402.

Instrument for Payment of Money Only. — In Carrington v. Bayley, 43 Miss. 507, it was held that a guardian's bond was not an instrument for the payment of money only, and therefore that a breach of the bond must be clearly assigned.

In Leggett v. Jones, 10 Wis. 34, a promissory note for the payment of money, adding the words "with exchange on New York," was held to be an instrument for the payment of money only.

Instrument in Writing Not under Seal — Chattel Mortgage. — In Hope v. Johnston, 28 Fla. 55, it was held that a chattel mortgage not under seal was an instrument in writing not under seal, within the meaning of a statute of limitations.

Sealed Instrument. — See the titles LIMITATION OF ACTIONS; SEALS; and see OBLIGATIONS.

1. Instrument — Escape. — Hurst v. State, 79 Ala. 58. This case was upon a statute making it an indictable offense to assist a prisoner to escape from jail. See also the title ESCAPE, vol. 11, p. 258.

Exemption. (See also the title EXEMPTIONS (FROM EXECUTION), vol. 12, p. 118.) — In holding the office furniture of a practicing lawyer exempt from execution the court said. "Strictly speaking, perhaps a table is not an instrument. Its general use is such that the word instrument seems inapplicable. But it should be borne in mind that a lawyer's table is used specifically in his employment; it is one of the things which he employs as a means in the accomplishment of his work. The fact that a table in its general use is not an instrument is not important. It appears quite different when it is adopted specifically as a means in an employment. It then fulfils all the essential ideas of an instrument." Abraham v. Davenport, 73 Iowa 112.

Same — Safe, Abstracts, Cabinet, and Table. — In Davidson v. Sechrist, 28 Kan. 324, one iron safe, one set of abstracts, and one cabinet and table were held exempt as instruments, where their owner carried on the business of insurance agent and abstracts of titles.

Same — Snakes. — Certain trained snakes, imported by a professional snake charmer, were held to be free from duty as implements, instruments, and tools of trade. The court said: "One definition of instrument is: 'One who or that which is made a means or caused to serve a purpose.' Webst. Dict., Instrument. 4. These snakes are clearly instruments within this definition. They are instruments with which she practices her profession, and are her professional instruments. As such, she seems to have been entitled to have them come with her, duty free." Magnon v. U. S., 66 Fed. Rep. 152.

Fishing Net. — In Jones v. Davies, (1898) 1 Q. B. 405, it was held that a fishing net with an illegally small mesh was not a like instrument to a snare, within the meaning of an English fishery act.

INSTRUMENTALITY. — See note 1.

INSUFFICIENCY — INSUFFICIENT. — See note 2.

Instrument of Gaming. (See also the title GAMING, vol. 14, p. 664.) — In Hirst v. Molesbury, L. R. 6 Q. B. 130, it was held that a deposit of a half sovereign as a bet on a dog race was not betting with the coin as an instrument of gaming at a game of chance, within an English gaming act.

In Tollet v. Thomas, 24 L. T. N. S. 509, a machine used for registering bets was held to be an instrument of gaming.

1. Instrumentality. — A statute provided that a solicitor through whose instrumentality property had been recovered should be entitled to charge for his costs upon such property, although his client might have been discharged before the trial of the action. In construing this statute Kay, J., said: "The words are 'through the instrumentality' of such solicitor. Suppose that a solicitor is employed in a hotly contested action, and prepares the whole of the case of the plaintiff down to the moment of trial, and that just before the trial the plaintiff changes his solicitor, and then, owing to the exertions of the solicitor formerly employed, succeeds in the action. Can it possibly be said that success is not owing to the instrumentality of the discharged solicitor? I cannot conceive that it could fairly be held that such a case as that is not within the statute." In re Wadsworth, 29 Ch. D. 520.

2. Insufficiency in Pleading. (See also the title ANSWERS IN EQUITY PLEADING, 1 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 896 et seq.) — "In common-law pleadings the word [insufficiency] was sometimes used. A pleading was said to be defective, uncertain, or bad, but it was not generally called insufficient. In chancery, however, the word was extensively used in connection with answers which were called insufficient when they did not distinctly and fully respond to the allegations or interrogatories in the bill. But it was always applied to those answers which did not explicitly respond, either by admitting or denying specifically the matters charged or inquired of by the complainant, and was not deemed applicable to the statement of new matter." Salinger v. Lusk, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 435, citing Spencer v. Van Duzen, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 556, and holding that the word was used in the same sense in Code Pro. N. Y., § 153 (Code Civ. Pro., § 494), providing that the plaintiff may demur to the answer for insufficiency.

Insufficient Evidence. (See also the title NEW TRIAL, 14 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 707.) — By Rev. Stat. D. C. 1875, § 804 (Comp. Stat. D. C. 1894, c. 55, § 6), it is provided as follows: "The justice who tries the cause may, in his discretion, entertain a motion, to be made on his minutes, to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial upon exceptions, or for insufficient evidence, or for excessive damages." By section 805 (c. 55, § 7) it is provided that "when such motion is made and heard upon the minutes, an appeal to the general term may be taken from the decision." It has been held that the phrase "insufficient evidence," as thus used, includes evidence that is insufficient in fact as well as that which is insufficient in law, and that, therefore, an appeal lies on a motion to set aside a verdict as being against the weight of the evidence. The court said: "Strictly speaking, evidence is said to be insufficient in law only in those cases where there is a total absence of such proof, either in its quantity or kind, as in the particular case some rule of law requires as essential to the establishment of the fact. Such, for instance, would be the case where a fact was attested by one witness only, when the law required two; or when the alleged evidence was proven to be verbal, when the law required it to be in writing. In such cases a verdict might be said to be against law because founded on insufficient evidence. Insufficiency in point of fact may exist in cases where there is no insufficiency in point of law; that is, there may be some evidence to sustain every element of the case, competent both in quantity and quality in law to sustain it, and yet it may be met by countervailing proof so potent as to leave no reasonable doubt of the opposing conclusion." Metropolitan R. Co. v. Moore, 121 U. S. 569.

For a similar construction of the phrase as used in the New York Code, see Algeo v. Duncan, 39 N. Y. 313; McDonald v. Walter, 40 N. Y. 551.

Under the Wisconsin statute which provides that a verdict may be set aside "for insufficient evidence," it has been held that where the plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is clearly entitled to a larger amount than that allowed by the jury, the verdict may be set aside as being found on "insufficient evidence," within the meaning of the section. Emmons v. Sheldon, 26 Wis. 648, the court saying: "In the case of Moore v. Wood, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 19 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 405, the court held that a party could not move on the minutes to set aside a verdict in his own favor, on the ground that the damages found by the jury were too small. 'By insufficient evidence,' the court say, 'is intended a case where the verdict is contrary to the evidence, not where the jury have found a verdict upon evidence, but have ignorantly or perversely found too small damages.' It seems to us, if a jury ignorantly or perversely finds for a plaintiff five dollars damages, when the evidence shows that he should recover a thousand dollars damages, that such a verdict is clearly contrary to evidence, and found upon insufficient evidence. See McDonald v. Walter, 40 N. Y. 551."

Streets. (See also the title STREETS AND SIDEWALKS) — In Schultz v. Milwaukee, 49 Wis. 254, 35 Am. Rep. 779, it was held that a city was not liable for an injury done to a person on a public street by a collision with others sliding down a hill thereon. The court said: "The injury of which the plaintiff complains was not caused by the insufficiency or want of repairs of the street in which he was injured, and hence the action will not lie" under Rev. Stat. Wis., in force in 1880, § 1339.

Defective and Insufficient. — In State v. Lavalley, 9 Mo. 836, it was said: "The words 'defective' and insufficient, although differing INSULTING. — See note 1.

INSURABLE INTEREST. — See the titles BENEFICIARIES (IN INSURANCE), vol. 3, p. 929 et seq.; FIRE INSURANCE, vol. 13, p. 136 et seq.; FIRES, vol. 13, p. 424; INSURANCE, post, p. 830; LIFE INSURANCE; MARINE INSURANCE.

somewhat in signification, are frequently used indifferently by the legislature as meaning the same thing; and as applied to recognizances, there can scarcely be said to be any distinction in fact."

Public Officers. — Insufficiency is an original incapacity which creates a forfeiture of office. People v. Wells, 2 Cal. 211. See also the title PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Insufficient on Demurrer. — In State v. Burghofer, 107 Mo. 9, the court said: "The language of section 4290 [Rev. Stat. Mo. 1889] is: 'When any indictment is quashed or adjudged insufficient upon demurrer, or when judgment thereon is arrested.' The defendant insists that this language 'clearly indicates the intention of the legislature to limit the discretion of the trial court to situations where, upon motion to quash, demurrer, or motion in arrest, an indictment has been held insufficient.' In the second place, in order to maintain his construction, he interpolates two words, 'form or substance,' after the word insufficient. * * * There are three cases where the state has a right to appeal: first, where the indictment is quashed; second, when the indictment is adjudged insufficient on demurrer; third, where the judgment thereon is arrested. The plain grammatical construction of this language would limit the word insufficient as a qualifying term to the second phrase only. * * * That the word insufficient has not the restricted meaning contended for by defendant appears from another consideration. The word 'demurrer' is used in its generic sense, and when it is affirmed that an appeal will lie when an indictment is adjudged insufficient on demurrer it must mean any insufficiency that can be presented by demurrer, and the failure to state facts constituting an offense is one ground of demurrer. This is elementary law. 4 Black. Com. 333."

Insufficiency of Sureties. — A statute provided that the court might require additional security if it had cause to suspect the insufficiency of the securities to a guardian's bond. In construing this statute in State v. Hull, 53 Miss. 644, the court said: "Insufficient is a comprehensive term, embracing every cause or ground the court may regard as amounting to that." See generally the title OFFICIAL BONDS.

1. Insulting Language. — The Alabama Criminal Code, section 4306, provides for the punishment of "any person who enters into or goes sufficiently near to the dwelling house of another, and in the presence or hearing of the family of the occupant thereof, or any member of his family, or any person who, in the presence or hearing of any female, uses abusive, insulting, or obscene language." In Benson v. State, 68 Ala. 513, the defendant went into the dwelling house of his niece, and speaking to her said, "If you don't give up my pistol I'll knock your brains out, by God," and speaking to a man there with her said, "Do you take it up?" It was held that the language was insulting. The court said: "If the same language had been used to a male it would doubtless have been construed as insulting, and would have tended to provoke a breach of the peace. Indeed, the defendant himself seems to have considered it insulting, for he turned immediately to a gentleman present and inquired if he 'took it up.' Why make this inquiry if there was no insult to be resented, or taken up? We would be loth to hold that language which would insult a man would not be insulting to a female, because, by reason of her sex and gentler nature, she would not resent it with blows."

Insulting Words Towards Female. — By the Texas Penal Code, article 698, manslaughter is defined as "voluntary homicide committed under the immediate influence of sudden passion arising from an adequate cause, but neither justified nor excused by law." Inter alia, the use of "insulting words" * * * by the person killed towards a female relation of the party guilty of the homicide" is specified as an "adequate cause." In Simmons v. State, 23 Tex. App. 657, in which case Simmons, the defendant, was charged with murder by stabbing, there was evidence showing that just before the defendant stabbed the deceased the latter applied to the former the words "damned son of a bitch." It was held that the use of these words did not make the homicide manslaughter. The court said: "We do not think this language comes within the meaning of the statute upon this subject. The term used is rather a sudden expression of anger and contempt, and, when used, no one understands it to be directed at the mother of the person to whom used." See also the title MURDER AND MANSLAUGHTER.

Under an indictment for using abusive, insulting, or vulgar language in or near the dwelling house of the prosecutor, in the presence of a female member of his household, it is not necessary to prove the exact words charged, but it is sufficient to prove them substantially as charged, providing there is no variance in the sense. Benson v. State, 68 Ala. 544.

I. INTRODUCTION — 1. Definition. — Insurance, in its most general and comprehensive signification, is a system of business by which one party, for an agreed consideration, proportionate to the risk involved, undertakes to a specified extent and under stipulated conditions to indemnify another against pecuniary loss arising from the destruction of or injury to property from certain perils, or to pay a stipulated sum upon the death or physical disability of a specified person, or upon his attaining a certain age.¹

In its more limited and technical sense insurance is the contract or agreement by means of which this indemnity or undertaking is effected.² The party who

2. Insurance as a Contract Defined. — Phillips on Insurance 1; Burr. L. Dict.; Black's L. Dict.; Bouv. L. Dict.; 2 Black. Com. 458; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State v. Farmers, etc., Mut. Benev. Assoc., 18 Neb. 276.

In the leading case of Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 B. & P. N. R. 269, Mr. Justice Lawrence defined insurance as "a contract by which the one party, in consideration of a price paid to him, adequate to the risk, becomes security to the other that he shall not suffer loss, damage, or prejudice by the happening of the perils specified to certain things which may be exposed to them."

"The General Object or Purpose of an Insurance Company is to afford indemnity or security against loss. Its engagement is not founded in any philanthropic, benevolent, or charitable principle; it is a purely business adventure, in which one, for a stipulated consideration or premium per cent., engages to make up, wholly or in part, or in a certain agreed amount, any specific loss which another may sustain; and it may apply to loss of property, to personal injury, or to loss of life. To grant indemnity or security against loss, for a consideration, is not only the design and purpose of an insurance company, but is also the dominant and characteristic feature of the contract of insurance." Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assoc., 137 Pa. St. 419.

A contract to indemnify a merchant or manufacturer, either wholly or partially, for loss by the insolvency of customers, is a contract of insurance; and a corporation whose business is the making of such contracts is an insurance corporation, within the meaning of the Wisconsin statutes. Shakman v. U. S. Credit System Co., 92 Wis. 366, 53 Am. St. Rep. 920.

In Com. v. Philadelphia Inquirer, 15 Pa. Co. Ct. 463, it was held that an advertisement in a newspaper, signed by its publishers, a corporation, offering to pay the sum of five hundred dollars "to the legal heir of any one who meets death by accident while pursuing his ordinary avocation, providing this coupon or a copy of the Inquirer [the newspaper making the offer] containing it be found on his or her person at the time of the accident which resulted in death, with his or her name signed in full," was in effect a contract of insurance, and upon quo warranto proceedings the corporation was excluded from the exercise of this franchise as not included in the powers granted to it.

What is known as a Beneficial Association, however, has a wholly different object and purpose in view. The great underlying purpose of the organization is not to indemnify or secure against loss; its design is to accumulate a fund from the contributions of its members, "for beneficial or protective purposes," to be used in their own aid or relief, in the misfortunes of sickness, injury, or death. The benefits, although secured by contract, and for that reason to a limited extent assimilated to the proceeds of insurance, are not so considered. Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assoc., 137 Pa. St. 419. See the title BENEVOLENT OR BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS, vol. 3, p. 1041.

Protection Against Loss of Bicycle. — A corporation was chartered under the Pennsylvania Act of April 29, 1874, by a Court of Common Pleas "for the purpose of the accumulation of a fund by assessments for the protection of its members from loss by reason of injury to or the losing of bicycles." Each member was required to pay six dollars per year, by virtue of which payments the corporation agreed (1) to clean the bicycle twice during the year; (2) to repair tires when punctured by accident; (3) to repair the bicycle when damaged by accident; (4) to replace the bicycle when destroyed by accident; (5) to replace the bicycle when stolen, if not recovered in eight weeks, and provide a bicycle during that time. There was no agreement to pay money for any loss. It was held that the corporation was not an insurance company. Com. v. Provident Bicycle Assoc., 178 Pa. St. 636.

Marriage Endowment Contract. — A contract between an association and its members pro-

so insures is termed the insurer or underwriter, he who is indemnified is termed the insured or assured, the agreed consideration is termed the premium, and the instrument by which the undertaking is effected is termed the policy.¹

2. Origin and History. — The contract of insurance sprang from the law maritime, and derives all its material rules and incidents therefrom. It undoubtedly grew out of the doctrine of contribution and general average, which is found in the maritime laws of the ancient Rhodians. By this law, if either ship, freight, or cargo was sacrificed to save the others, all had to contribute their proportionate share of the loss. This division of loss naturally suggested a provisional division of risk, first among those engaged in the same enterprise, and next among associations of shipowners and shipping merchants. Hence it is found that the earliest form of the contract of insurance was that of mutual insurance, which, according to Pardessus, dates back to the tenth century, if not earlier, and in Italy and Portugal was made obligatory. By a regulation of the latter kingdom, made in the fourteenth century, every shipowner and merchant in Lisbon and Oporto was bound to contribute two per cent. of the profits of each voyage to a common fund from which to pay losses whenever they should occur.² The next step in the system was that of insurance upon premium. Capitalists, familiar with the risks of navigation, were found willing to guarantee against them for a small consideration or premium paid. This, the final form of the contract, was in use as early as the beginning of the fourteenth century, and the tradition is that it was introduced into England in that century by the Lombard merchants, who settled in London and brought with them the maritime usages of Venice and other Italian cities.³ Insurance against fire and the other forms of property insurance are derived by natural process of evolution from marine insurance, and are governed by the same general principles, but life and accident insurance are of a much later date, and differ in many material respects from the insurance of property.

3. Various Kinds of Insurance. — The kinds of insurance are almost as various as are the things which are susceptible of injury or destruction and the perils to which they are exposed. Not only does the system with its ramifications provide indemnity and protection against the risk of loss from such natural causes as the death or injury of the insured and the destruction of property by fire, storm, and the perils of the sea, but it provides also against loss from such artificial causes as the insolvency of debtors, the failure of the title to land, and the infidelity and negligence of employees. These various sorts of insurance and the principles which govern them will be considered under special titles in this work;⁴ it is intended under this title to treat only those principles which are applicable to all.

II. THE CONTRACT, ITS NATURE, REQUISITES, AND INCIDENTS — 1. Nature of Contract — a. IN GENERAL — An Aleatory Contract. — The contract of insurance has been termed an aleatory contract, for the reason that it is one involving risk or hazard. It is, however, very different in its nature from a mere wager. In the latter the risk of loss is created by the contract itself; in the former vided that if a member paid an initiation fee and certain annual dues for nine years and until he was married, and also an assessment on the marriage of any associate, the association would, upon the marriage of such member, pay to his wife as many dollars as there were associates in the order, not exceeding one thousand dollars, provided the member did not, on pain of forfeiture of all rights under the contract, marry within two years. It was held that this was not a contract of insurance, and the insurance commissioner had no jurisdiction in such business. State v. Towle, 80

4. See the table of cross-references at the beginning of this title.

the risk exists independently of the contract, and the insurance merely shifts the liability from the one party to the other.¹ But the nature of the risk in property insurance is very different from that in life insurance. In the former the loss may or may not occur, and, should it occur, may be total or partial. In the latter the event insured against is certain to occur, and, when it occurs, to cause a total loss, so that the time of the happening is the only contingent element.²

Executed and Executory Contract. — A contract of insurance is both executed and executory. It is executed as to the insured by the payment of the annual premiums,³ while it is wholly executory on the part of the insurer, whose undertaking depends upon a future event.⁴

b. CONTRACT OF INDEMNITY — (1) Insurance of Property — (a) In General. — The purpose of property insurance is indemnity, and the contract by which this purpose is effected must be so construed as to advance this principle and to prevent its prostitution to illegal uses as a mode of speculation. A sound public policy forbids the enforcement of any contract by which the insured would derive a profit from the happening of the event insured against. The insured should have an interest in the preservation of the thing rather than in its destruction.⁵

(b) Liability of Insurer — aa. LIMITED TO LOSS ACTUALLY SUSTAINED. — Hence it follows that the insured is entitled to recover under the policy only such loss as he has actually sustained, not exceeding the sum stipulated.⁶ This is the rule of the common law, except in marine insurance, where valued policies are permitted;⁷ but in some of the states statutes have been enacted providing that where the insured property is wholly destroyed, the amount written in Wisconsin. — Johannes v. Phenix Ins. Co., 66 Wis. 50, 57 Am. Rep. 249.

The Objection to Over-insurance is entirely of a public nature and is grounded upon those moral and political circumstances which require that contracts of insurance be restrained to the cases of real interest and to indemnities for actual losses. 7. Valued Policies. — A policy of insurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with this qualification, that the parties may agree beforehand in estimating the value of the subject assured, by way of liquidated damages, as indeed they may in any other contract to indemnify. Irving v. Manning, 1 H. L. Cas. 287, cited in Aitchison v. Lohre, 4 App. Cas. 755.

In a valued policy the exact value need not be proven by the plaintiff to make a prima facie case. The value named in it is the amount agreed upon by the parties as the liquidating the policy shall be taken as the value of the property and is the measure of recovery by the insured.¹

Want of Insurable Interest. — If the insured has no insurable interest in property, he cannot be damaged by its destruction, and consequently can recover nothing under the policy.²

Restoration of Property. — So if a mortgagee insures his interest in property, the purpose of the contract is that the property shall remain unimpaired as security, and if, after a loss, the property is made as good as before by other parties than the insurance company, no right of action against the company exists.³

bb. WHEN PROPERTY IS DESTROYED BY TORTFEASOR. — When property insured is destroyed by the wilful act or negligence of a third person, the owner has a cause of action against both the wrongdoer and the insurer. The liability of the wrongdoer is in legal effect first and principal, and that of the insurer secondary, not in order of time, but in order of ultimate liability. The insured may apply to whichever one of these parties he pleases—to the wrongdoer by his right of law, to the insurer by virtue of his contract.

If He Applies First to the Wrongdoer, who pays him, he thereby diminishes his loss by the application of the sum arising out of the subject of the insurance, and his claim is for the balance.⁴

If He Applies First to the Insurer and receives the whole loss, he holds the claim against the wrongdoer in trust for the insurer,⁵ for he cannot for his own benefit recover against both.⁶

Waiver by Insurer. — It seems, however, that the insurer may, by declining to become a party plaintiff to a suit against the tortfeasor, estop himself from subsequently claiming the benefit of the damages which the insured may recover by a successful prosecution of the suit.⁷

Rights Renounced by Insured. — It has also been held that the insurer may recover from the insured the full value of any rights or remedies against a third person which have been renounced by the insured, and to which the insurer, but for such renunciation, would have had the right to be subrogated.⁸

cc. LIABILITY OF SEVERAL INSURERS — (aa) In Absence of "Other Insurance" Clause. — When a loss occurs to property which is insured by two or more insurers, the insured cannot recover for the whole loss from each of them, since he is entitled damages in case of loss. It is so agreed upon for the express purpose of relieving the other party from the task of proving precise values, as either party may find it for his or their interest to repose upon the stipulated value. The value fixed by the policy is conclusive upon the parties, unless there is fraud or accident or mistake. Sturm v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 77; Watson v. Insurance Co. of North America, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 1; Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 206; Clark v. Ocean Ins. Co., 16 Pick. (Mass.) 289.

The Effect of a Valued Policy is not to conclude the underwriter from showing that the assured had no interest, and that in fact it was a mere wagering policy within the statute; but in order to avoid disputes as to the quantum of the interest of the assured, the parties agree that it shall be estimated at a certain value. Shawe v. Felton, 2 East 109.

In the Adjustment of Partial Losses, valued policies are to be treated as open policies, and the insurer is not to be prejudiced or injured by a stipulation which is commonly made at the nomination of the assured, without examination or inquiry. Clark v. United F. & M. Ins. Co., 7 Mass. 365, 5 Am. Dec. 50.

8. Rights Renounced by Insured. — West of England F. Ins. Co. v. Isaacs, (1896) 2 Q. B. 377.

Qualified Release. — When a loss upon insured property has been caused by the alleged negligent act of a gas company, resulting in an explosion and fire, the assured may settle with and release the gas company from all claim for injuries not covered by the insurance, without prejudice to his right to recover from the merely to indemnity, but he may elect to consider each insurer as liable to bear a proportionate share of the loss, and recover accordingly, or he may require any one of them to pay the whole loss;¹ in which case the one who pays the whole or a disproportionate part of the loss will have a remedy against the others for a contribution, so as to equalize the liability of each.²

(bb) When Policies Contain Clause. — To obviate this circuitry of action it is now the practice for insurance companies to incorporate in their policies a clause providing that where there is other insurance, each insurer shall be liable only for such proportion of the loss as the amount of its policy bears to the whole insurance.³ Where this provision is contained in the policies, the fact that one of the companies proves insolvent does not increase the liability of the others.⁴

Policies Must Cover Same Interest in Same Property. — In order that there may be an apportionment of liability between different insurers, it is not essential that the policies should be issued to the same person, but the insurance must be upon the same interest in the same property or in some part thereof.⁵ If the policies cover the same interest and inure to the benefit of the same person, it is sufficient. Thus, if the agent and the principal each take out a policy on the same goods, and both for the benefit of the principal, an apportionment of liability between the insurers must be made.⁶

But Where a Mortgagor and Mortgagee insure their respective interests in property in different companies, each company is liable in case of loss according to the insurable interest of the insured in the property, and there can be no apportionment of the loss between them.⁷

So Where a Carrier and a Shipper, each for his own benefit, obtain insurance upon goods carried, there will be no apportionment between the insurance companies.⁸

(2) Life Insurance. — In an early English case an attempt was made to insurers for the loss occasioned by the fire. Insurance Co. of North America v. Fidelity Title, etc., Co., 123 Pa. St. 523, 10 Am. St. Rep. 546.

Where in such case the party insured commenced an action on both policies at the same time, and one of the insurers paid into court one-half of the actual loss (first making certain deductions by way of set-off), and the insured took the money out of court, it was held that this was prima facie evidence that he had made his election to consider each insurer responsible for one half of the sum actually at risk. Wiggin v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 18 Pick. (Mass.) 145, 29 Am. Dec. 576.

2. Security Ins. Co. v. St. Paul F., etc., Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 233. And see the title CONTRIBUTION AND EXONERATION, vol. 7, p. 352.

Double Insurance takes place where the assured makes two or more insurances on the same subject, risk, and interest, in which case the policies are considered as one, and the insurers are liable pro rata and are entitled to contribution to equalize payments made on account of losses. Sloat v. Royal Ins. Co., 49 Pa. St. 14, 88 Am. Dec. 477.

The right to contribution is based upon the concurrence of the policies, and the necessary incident of its existence is that the several insurers should be bound with equal certainty, and in the same sense for the same loss. Baltimore F. Ins. Co. v. Loney, 20 Md. 20.

3. When Policies Contain "Other Insurance" Clause. — Barnes v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 3 McCrary (U. S.) 226; Page v. Sun Ins. Office, 74 Fed. Rep. 203; Golde v. Whipple, 7 N. Y. App. Div. 48.

Where there are several policies containing a clause providing for only a ratable payment in case of other policies on the same subject, they are all and each liable to pay the ratable proportion mentioned in the clause, although it happened that some have paid more than their share, and even enough to cover the whole loss, and this whether they had or had not knowledge of all the policies at the time. Lucas v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 635.

If a Greater Loss Is Proved than the Whole Amount Insured by Different Policies, the party insured will be entitled to recover the full amount of each policy, unless the recovery is limited by the policy to only a proportion of the loss. Peoria M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ill. 553.

apply the principle of indemnity to the contract of life insurance,¹ but the case has long since been overruled, and it is now the doctrine that life insurance is not a contract of indemnity, but an agreement to pay a certain sum in the event therein specified, in consideration of the payment of the stipulated premium or premiums.²

c. PERSONAL CONTRACT. — Insurance is a personal contract, and appertains to the insured and not to the thing which is subject to the risk against which he is protected. It is not a contract running with the land in the case of real estate, nor running with the personalty, so to speak, in the case of a chattel.³ An insurer contracts with reference to the character of the assured for integrity and prudence. He might be willing to make good the loss of one by the destruction of property owned by him, while he would be altogether unwilling to insure the same property if owned by another.⁴

Vendor and Purchaser. — Hence, if property insured be sold, the contract, unless it be assigned to the purchaser, with the consent of the insurer, is at an end, and no suit or action can be maintained upon it. It does not pass to the purchaser as incident to the thing sold.⁵ A policy may, however, be so framed that the insurance will be inseparably attached to the property meant to be covered, so that successive owners, during the continuance of the risks, may become, in turn, the parties really insured.⁶

If One Who Has Taken Out Insurance upon Real Property Dies, the contract does not pass to the heir as an incident of the property, and the executor or administrator is the only one who can take the contract and enforce it;⁷ but in case

None but the parties to the contract, or their legal representatives in case of their death, can avail themselves of the contract, although others may in fact have an equitable or even a legal interest in the property insured. The only exception to this rule which has been admitted exists where a policy has been bona fide and for a valuable consideration assigned with notice to the underwriter and an assent on his part, either express or implied. *Carroll v. A fire-insurance policy was issued to A, "his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," on his dwelling house a certain sum, and "on furniture and clothing therein" a certain other sum. A sold the real estate to B, and assigned the policy to him with the consent of the insurers. A did not sell the furniture and clothing to B, but removed it, and B, when he took possession of the house, placed therein his own furniture and clothing of equal character and value, and this was burned with the house. It was held that B might recover of the insurers the amount of the original insurance upon the furniture and clothing. Cummings v. Cheshire County Mut. F. Ins. Co., 55 N. H. 457.

of loss, the amount recovered stands in the hands of the administrator or executor, not as personal assets, but as realty, subject to dower and to the lien of creditors by judgment before distribution among the heirs at law.¹

Insurance Money Which a Purchaser at an Execution Sale May Receive within the year, upon a policy taken out on the property purchased, belongs to him, and cannot be recovered by the execution debtor seeking to redeem the property from the sale.²

Insurance upon Property Fraudulently Conveyed. — If property which has been conveyed in fraud of creditors is insured by the grantee, and is destroyed before suit is brought to have the conveyance set aside, the amount due upon the policy is not to be deemed proceeds of the property, and cannot be subjected by the grantor's creditors to the payment of his debts.³

Mortgagor and Mortgagee. — A mortgagee cannot claim the benefit of a policy of insurance effected upon the mortgaged property by the mortgagor, or vice versa. Each has an insurable interest, but neither can, as a general rule, take advantage of an insurance effected by the other.⁴ If a mortgagee in possession for condition broken insures his interest in the premises, without any agreement therefor between him and the mortgagor, and a loss accrues, which is paid to the mortgagee, the mortgagor, on a bill to redeem and an account stated for the purpose, is not entitled to have the amount of such loss deducted from the mortgagee's charges for repairs.⁵

Bailor and Bailee. — In the absence of special contract a bailee is not bound to insure the goods intrusted to him, and if he voluntarily effects insurance upon such goods and they are destroyed by fire the bailor cannot recover the proceeds of such insurance, either from the insurer or from the bailee.⁶

A Trespasser in whose hands personal property is accidentally destroyed cannot avail himself of the recovery of insurance money by the owner to reduce the recovery of damages against him for his trespass.⁷

2. Requisites of Contract — a. PROPER PARTIES — (1) Who May Insure. — It may be stated as a general rule that any one legally capable of contracting, and every corporation which is empowered by its charter so to do, may enter into and be bound by a contract of insurance.⁸

(2) Who May Be Insured. — Legal capacity to contract is also the only requisite to enable one to take out a policy of insurance. The rights of infants, married women, corporations, partnerships, and the like, to effect insurance, will be treated in other parts of this work, under the various insurance titles⁹ and in the articles devoted to the discussion of the legal rights of these persons.¹⁰

The contract is not attached or an incident to his mortgage. It is strictly a personal contract for the benefit of the mortgagor, to which the mortgagee has no more title than any other creditor. Agency.—The contract of insurance, like other contracts, may be effected through the agency of a third person without the authority of the party to be benefited, if he subsequently recognizes it. But to enable the beneficiary to sue upon it directly, he must be expressly named, or the policy must be so framed as to cover generally or specifically the interest of all concerned.¹

Agent Insuring His Own Property.—In conformity to the rule that an agent cannot represent two parties whose interests are antagonistic, it is held that a policy written by an agent of an insurance company upon his own property is not binding until the contract is approved by the company.² But if the company accepts the premium and makes no objection to the risk, it has been held that this is equivalent to approval and renders the policy binding.³

Q b. INSURABLE INTEREST—(1) Necessity at Time of Creation of Contract—Validity of Wager Policies.—It seems to have been anciently the doctrine of the common law that mere wager policies, that is, policies in which the insured has no interest whatever in the matter insured, were void as against public policy.⁴ This was the law of England prior to the Revolution of 1688. After that period a course of decisions grew up, sustaining wager policies.⁵ The legislature finally interposed and prohibited such insurance, first in regard to marine insurance, by the statute 19 Geo. II., c. 37, and later with regard to lives, by the statute 14 Geo. III., c. 48.⁶ In the United States statutes to the same effect have been passed in some of the states; but where there has been no such legislation, in most cases either the English statutes have been considered as operative or the older common law has been followed.⁷

The agent of an insurance company cannot bind it by issuing without authority a policy on property in which a bank of which he is president holds the beneficial interest. Rockford Ins. Co. v. Winfield, 57 Kan. 576.

And an authority to countersign a policy issued to himself, cannot be extended so as to cover verbal contracts made with himself or with a firm of which he is a partner. Nor can it be extended so as to cover a policy executed after a fire. Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Hopkins, 16 Ill. App. 220.

But it has been held that a person employed by the owner of property as a mere watchman or guard thereof is not by such employment incapacitated to issue a valid policy on the property in behalf of an insurance company of which he is the agent. Northrup v. Germania F. Ins. Co., 48 Wis. 420.

Contract of Reinsurance.—An insurance agent, acting as such for both the plaintiff and the defendant, issued a policy for the former for twenty-five hundred dollars, and was notified by it to cancel the policy or reduce it to one thousand dollars. Upon receipt of this notice, the agent reinsured the risk in the latter company for fifteen hundred dollars by entering the agreement for reinsurance in his "binder book." The property insured was destroyed by fire before the reinsurance had been reported to the defendant company, or had come to its knowledge. It was held that an action was not maintainable upon the agreement for reinsurance, since the agent had a discretion to exercise for both parties, and could not, without their knowledge and assent, make a binding contract between them. *Empire State Ins. 6. The Statute 14 Geo. III., c. 48, "recites that the making assurances on lives and other events wherein the insured shall have no interest hath introduced a mischievous kind of gaming, and for the remedy thereof it enacts that no assurances shall be made by any one on the life or lives of any person or persons or on any other events whatsoever, wherein the person or persons for whose use and benefit or on whose account such policy shall be made shall have no interest, or by way of gaming or wagering; and that every assurance made contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof shall be null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever." Dalby v. India, etc., L. Assur. Co., 28 Eng. L. & Eq. 312.

7. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 457.

Insurable Interest Now Necessary. — At all events, it has become a fixed rule of insurance law that the assured must have an interest of some kind in the subject-matter of the insurance, whether property¹ or life.² Two reasons may be assigned for this rule. In the first place, it is inexpedient that a contract so necessary for the protection of legitimate business should be prostituted to illegal uses as a mode of speculation; and in the second place, it is opposed to public policy, because demoralizing to the insured, that he should be permitted to enter into any contract under which he would have an interest in the destruction of the subject-matter rather than in its preservation.³

(2) Necessity at Time of Loss — (a) Property Insurance. — When the insurance is upon property, not only must the insured have an interest in the subject-matter of the contract at its inception, but also at the time of the loss; for the contract being one of indemnity, the recovery by the insured is limited to the loss actually sustained by him. As soon as his interest ceases in the property, the contract is at an end, from the impossibility of any loss happening to him afterward.⁴

(b) Life Insurance. — But this principle does not apply to life insurance, for the reason that it is not a contract of indemnity. The only reason for requiring an insurable interest is to eliminate from the contract the character of a wager; and if a fair and proper insurable interest, of whatever kind, exists at the time of taking out the policy, and it is taken out in good faith, the object and purpose of the rule which condemns wager policies is sufficiently attained, and the insurer must pay the full amount of insurance, according to the contract, without reference to the subsequent diminution or cessation of the insurable interest.⁵

The Assignment of a Policy to a Party Not Having an Insurable Interest is as objectionable as the taking out of a policy in his name. Nor is its character changed because it is for a portion merely of the insurance money. To the extent to which the assignee stipulates for the proceeds of the policy beyond the sums advanced by him, he stands in the position of one holding a wager policy. Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775.

Where a mortgagee insures the property mortgaged, it is in fact but an insurance of his debt, and if the debt be afterwards paid or extinguished, the policy ceases from that time to have any operation; and even if the premises insured are subsequently destroyed by fire, he has no right to recover for the loss, for he sustained no damage thereby. *Carpenter v. c. SUBJECT MATTER — (1) Existence. — The third requisite of a valid contract of insurance is a proper subject-matter. In the first place, the property insured must be in existence, or the person whose life is the subject of the risk must be alive, at the time when the contract takes effect; for if the property has been destroyed¹ or the life insured has become extinct² prior to that time, there is nothing for the insurance to operate upon, and the contract is consequently void.

(2) Property Illegally Kept or Used. — Whether the insurance contract will be rendered void by the illegal use to which the property insured is being put at time of the loss, is a doubtful question. The rule is that where the direct purpose of the contract is to effect, advance, or encourage acts in violation of law, it is void; but if the contract which it is sought to enforce is collateral and independent, though in some measure connected with acts done in violation of law, the contract is not void.³ The application of this rule is by no means easy.

Insurance upon Voyage Illegally Undertaken. — In respect to marine insurance, it has been held that where a voyage is undertaken in violation of a blockade, or of an embargo, or of the provisions of a treaty, it is illegal, and that insurance on either the ship, freight, or cargo embarked in the illegal traffic is void.⁴

So the Insurance of Lottery Tickets has been held to be against public policy and void.⁵

Articles Kept for Sale in Violation of Law. — In Massachusetts it has been held that a policy of insurance against loss by fire on intoxicating liquors kept by the insured for sale in violation of law is void.⁶ A contrary decision has, however, been rendered in Michigan.⁷ The cases may perhaps be distinguished by the fact that the Massachusetts statute rendered the liquors subject to confiscation, while in Michigan the illegal sale of them merely rendered the seller liable to a penalty. Conformably to this distinction it has been held that an insurance policy on a stock of medicines kept for sale by an unregistered pharmacist is not void.⁸

L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer*, 94 U. S. 457.

Excepted Risks. — Where an insurance policy by its terms forbade its agents from taking risks upon certain classes of property, among which were steam sawmills, it was held that this prohibition did not apply to a building erected and formerly used for that purpose, but lying inactive and unused when insured. Etna Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342.

Illegal Use of Building. — It has been held that the illegal use of a part of a building did not render void an insurance policy thereon.¹

d. RISK — (1) Insurer Must Be Subjected to Liability. — From the very nature of the contract, it is essential to its validity that the insurer should be subjected to liability; for if from the nonexistence of the subject-matter, or from any other cause, the event insured against cannot by any possibility occur, the contract is void.²

(2) Causes of Loss — (a) In General. — The causes of loss against which the insurance contract may be framed to indemnify the insured are as various as the perils to which things insurable may be exposed. These will be properly considered under the particular insurance titles in this work.

(b) Negligence of Insured. — It is well settled that a loss occasioned by the ordinary negligence of the assured or by his servants or agents, without fraud or design, is a loss within the policy for which the insurers are liable. Negligence of the assured is always one of the risks insured against.³

Fraudulent Negligence. — But fraudulent negligence is not insured against. If the insured knows that a fire which he can readily put out, if so inclined, has originated on the insured premises by his negligence, and he fails to make any effort to put it out, he cannot recover upon the policy.⁴

Carriers' Negligence. — While a common carrier cannot stipulate for exemption from liability for loss of goods or injury to passengers caused by the negligence of its servants, there is no reason of public policy which prohibits the carrier from contracting with a third party for insurance against losses from this cause. Such insurance does not diminish the carrier's responsibility to the passenger, but increases his means of meeting the responsibility.⁵

(c) Seaworthiness of Vessel. — In marine insurance there is an implied warranty that the vessel which is the subject of insurance, or in which the goods insured are to be carried, or out of which the freight insured is to arise, is seaworthy; and if the vessel is not seaworthy, the contract is void.⁶

(3) Commencement and Duration of Risk — (a) Commencement — aa. IN GENERAL. — If no time at which the risk is to commence is mentioned in the contract of insurance, it will be presumed to take effect immediately.⁷

Date Not Conclusive. — The date of the policy itself is not conclusive, for although the policy may by its terms profess to take effect at a certain time, yet it may be shown that from want of delivery, failure to comply with some condition precedent, or other cause, it did not take effect until a subsequent time.⁸

A Fire-insurance Policy upon a Stock of Fireworks and other merchandise, hazardous or extra-hazardous, will not be presumed to cover an article so specially hazardous that the assured was prohibited by a town ordinance from keeping it, but the term "fireworks" within the meaning of the policy has reference only to such fireworks as might properly be kept in store. Jones v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 51 N. Y. 318.

1. Building Used for Lottery. — In an action on a policy of insurance on a building described as a shoe factory, and its contents, it appeared in evidence that on the evening preceding the fire a lottery was drawn in one of the rooms of the building and that about fifty persons were present in the course of the evening. This use of the building was with the consent of the plaintiffs, both of whom were present, and each held a ticket. The insurance company set up these facts as a defense, claiming that the illegal use of the building avoided the policy, but it was held that there was no natural, probable, or actual connection between the offense committed and the loss by fire, and judgment for the plaintiff was rendered. Boardman v. Merrimack Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. (Mass.) 583.

bb. PROSPECTIVE INSURANCE. — The parties may fix a future date for the commencement of the risk,¹ for it is not essential that the commencement of the term should be coincident with the execution of the contract.

cc. RETROSPECTIVE INSURANCE. — Nor is it in contravention of public policy for the parties to frame their contract so as to give a retrospective operation to it. When, as in marine insurance, the thing to be insured is at a distance, and its status is unknown to the parties, an insurance "lost or not lost" may bind the insurer for a loss occurring within the term contemplated by the contract, but before the date of its actual execution. Such a provision is quite usual in fire as well as in marine insurance, and without these express words circumstances may sufficiently imply the same intent.²

Fraudulent Concealment by Insured. — The utmost good faith, however, is required in making such a contract, and if the insured had knowledge of the loss at the time when he procured the policy, his concealment of the fact from the insurer is a fraud upon him, and avoids the contract.³

(b) Duration. — The duration of a risk is an essential element of the contract,⁴ and must be fixed by the agreement of the parties, yet it is sufficient if it was agreed between them that the insurance should terminate at such time as either party should elect.⁵

e. AGREEMENT — (1) In General — Terms Must Be Fixed. — The agreement of the parties must include all the elements and terms essential to the existence of the contract. If the parties have not agreed on the subject of insurance, the limit and duration of the risk, the perils insured against, the amount to be paid in the event of a loss, the rate of premium, or upon any other element or term which may be peculiar to the particular contract, whatever may have been the negotiations or propositions passing between them, these have not reached the form and obligation of a subsisting contract.⁶ In other

1. Prospective Insurance. — Michigan Pipe Co. v. North British, etc., Ins. Co., 97 Mich. 493.

A policy of insurance bearing a given date and purporting to insure for the future only cannot be made the basis of an action to recover for a loss occurring upon a prior date; and if for any reason such policy is subject to reformation as to date, it can be reformed only in a court having power to grant affirmative equitable relief in such matters. Fowler v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co., 100 Ga. 331.

A verbal agreement made in October to issue a policy of insurance for twelve months beginning in the "early part" of November covers a loss occurring on the 19th day of November. Home Ins. Co. v. Adler, 77 Ala. 242.

2. Retrospective Insurance. — Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 528; General Interest Ins. Co. v. Ruggles, 12 Wheat (U. S.) 408; Hammond v. Allen, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 387; Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hallock, 27 N. J. L. 645, 72 Am. Dec. 379.

Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co.*, 67 Tex. 160, 60 Am. Rep. 15. See also Wilson v. New Hampshire F. Ins. Co., 140 Mass. 210.

4. Duration of Risk. — A policy of insurance issued and dated October 28, 1890, "for the term of one year from the 28th day of October, 1890, * * * to the 28th day of October, 1890," shows on its face that a mistake was made in the draft of it, in making the date of its expiration the same as the date of its issue; and such policy is construed to be "for the term of one year" from the date of its issuance. Boulden v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 96 Ala. 609.

A policy of insurance, expressed to be "from the first day of August in the year 1854, at noon, until the first day of August in the year 1854, at noon," may be shown, by reference to the indorsements made by the insurers on the back of the policy, and to the amount of the premium and deposit note, to be an insurance of five years from the first of August, 1854. Liberty Hall Assor. v. Housatonic Mut. F. Ins. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 261.

A policy of insurance expired June 10, 1878. On or prior to June 13, 1878, an application for renewal was made, and on June 19, 1878, a written renewal was issued which, by its terms, continued the original policy in force for the term of one year, to wit, from June 10, 1878, to June 10, 1879. The premises were destroyed by fire June 16, 1879. It was held that the term of the renewal had then expired. Even if there was no contract of renewal until June 19, 1878, the period expressly fixed in the agreement cannot be extended by construction to one year from that date. Fuchs v. Germantown Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 60 Wis. 286.

words, the negotiations must leave nothing open for future determination, but must attain the condition of a definite and complete agreement, binding the insured to pay the premium though the loss does not happen, as well as binding the insurer to pay the amount insured if the loss does happen.¹

General Agreement. — If, however, it is impossible at the time of negotiation to obtain important facts affecting the subject of their dealings, the parties may make a general agreement to accomplish their purpose as well as they can. If the value and situation of the property are in doubt, they may assess its value at a certain sum temporarily, and agree upon the rate of premium which would be fair and reasonable, until such time as the proper rate can be fixed.²

(2) Mode of Agreement — (a) In General. — The agreement is usually effected by an offer or application by the insured and its acceptance by the insurer, or else by the tender of a policy by the insurer and its acceptance by the insured.

The Acceptance of the Proposal, from whomsoever emanating, is essential to the creation of a contract, for it is not consummated until the minds of the parties have met in the fixing of all of its terms and conditions.³

The Assent of the Parties may be shown by their acts and the attending circumstances, as well as by the words they employed.⁴

(b) Application by Insured and Acceptance by Insurer. — When an application for insurance is presented to an insurance company, stating what is wanted, and

A Contract Which Expresses No Time for the Risk to Continue is too vague and uncertain to be treated as complete. Clark v. Brand, 62 Ga. 23.

Rate of Premium Not Settled. — A contract of insurance upon mill property will not be held to have been completed where in the oral negotiations between the parties the rate of premium was not determined, nor was the apportionment of the risk between the building and the machinery therein fixed. Kimball v. Lion Ins. Co., 17 Fed. Rep. 625.

Where an Agent for Several Insurance Companies Is Directed to Place a Given Amount of Insurance, without any expectation on the part of the applicant that it will all be written in any one of the companies, which are not mentioned by name, no contract exists as to any one nor as to all of them, and no liability attaches, until further action to determine and define the risk, in doing which the agent acts as agent for the insured. *Michigan Pipe Co. v. Michigan F. & M. the terms, and its officer or any agent having authority accepts the risk, the contract is complete.¹

Approval of Home Office. — If, however, the application provides that no liability shall attach to the agent's acceptance until the application has been approved by the home office, the company is not liable if the person upon whose life the insurance is placed dies² or if the property which is the subject of insurance is destroyed or damaged³ before the application is approved.

The Acceptance must be signified by some act.⁴ The delay of the insurer in accepting or rejecting the proposal for insurance does not take the place of assent.⁵

Withdrawal of Application. — The applicant may withdraw his application at any time before it has been accepted, and if he does so he will not be bound to accept a policy subsequently made out and tendered to him.⁶

(c) Tender of Policy by Insurer and Acceptance by Insured. — If the parties do not agree upon all the terms of the policy before it is issued,⁷ or if the policy as issued does not conform to the terms proposed by the insured,⁸ the policy is not binding as a contract until accepted by the insured.

(3) Form of Contract — (a) In General. — For sake of convenience, the contracts of fire and marine insurance usually, and life and accident insurance sometimes, exist in two forms: first, a preliminary contract intended to protect the applicant until the policy can be properly issued, and second, the executed contract or policy itself.⁹

(b) Preliminary Contract — aa. POWER OF INSURANCE COMPANIES TO MAKE. — This preliminary contract is of the greatest importance, for if the applicant could not be made secure until all the formal documents were executed and delivered, the beneficial effect of the insurance system would be greatly impaired;¹⁰ and a clause in the state insurance law¹¹ or in the charter of an insurance company¹²

Where, in an action upon a contract, the plaintiff's case consists of the proof of a proposal, with the presumption of assent thereto arising from the silence of the defendant, no legal inference of a contract can arise out of such silence without evidence of a duty to speak on the part of the defendant which was neglected to the plaintiff's harm. *Royal Ins. An insurance agent agreed to insure the plaintiff's house, on certain specified terms, in some company represented by him, but not designated. The defendant, one of those companies, decided to insure the house on entirely different terms; but before the plaintiff was informed thereof the company determined not to take the risk. providing that policies shall be executed in a certain manner does not affect the power of the insurer to make these preliminary arrangements. Such a contract remains in force until it is superseded by the issuance of a regular policy, or until the risk is rejected by the insurer, and the insurer is liable for any loss in the meanwhile.¹

bb. NO FORMALITY REQUIRED — (aa) In General. — It is necessarily of the most informal character, for it would be impracticable for a company to carry on its business at a distance — or, at least, business so conducted would be attended with great embarrassment and inconvenience — if such preliminary arrangements required for their validity and efficacy the formalities required for the executed contract.²

(bb) May Be Oral. — The contract is sometimes evidenced by a binding slip signed by the insurer's agent³ or by a memorandum in his record book, but neither the statute of frauds⁴ nor public policy requires it to be in writing, and it is equally valid if made orally.⁵

Under the Code of Georgia, 1873, § 2794

Power of Agent. — As a general rule any agent having power to bind the insurer by the issuance of a policy has power to bind him by a parol contract.¹

Conditions of Ordinary Policy Govern. — Such a contract, however, is subject to the conditions incorporated in an ordinary policy issued by the insurer.² When nothing is said in the negotiations about special rates of insurance or special conditions of the policy, it will be presumed that those which are usual and customary were intended.³

cc. ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACT — Action at Law. — The insured may bring an action at law upon the preliminary contract in the same manner as upon the policy.⁴

Suit in Equity. — He may, however, treat the contract as an agreement to insure, and resort to a court of equity to compel the delivery of a policy either before or after the happening of the loss; and being properly in that court after the loss has happened, it is according to the established course of procedure, in order to avoid delay and expense to the parties, for that court to proceed and give such final relief as the circumstances of the case demand.⁵ As the only real question is the one which a court of equity must necessarily have to decide in the exercise of its peculiar jurisdiction in enforcing a specific execution of the agreement, it would be an idle technicality for that court to turn the party over to his remedy at law upon the policy. And no doubt it was a strong sense of this injustice that led the court at an early date to establish the rule that, having properly acquired jurisdiction over the subject for a necessary purpose, it was the duty of the court to proceed and do final and complete justice between the parties where it could as well be done in that court as in a proceeding at law.⁶

(c) Policy — aa. MUST CONFORM TO PRELIMINARY AGREEMENT. — If the parties have entered into a preliminary agreement for insurance, the insurer is bound in good faith to furnish a policy in the usual form and with the usual clauses.⁷

(Code 1895, § 2089), a contract of fire insurance, to be binding, must be in writing, though delivery is not essential if the contract is consummated in other respects. *Symington v. While a binding slip contains none of the conditions usually found in insurance policies, the contract evidenced by it is the ordinary policy of insurance issued by the insurer, so that in any construction of the contract it must be regarded as though it had expressed that the present insurance was under the terms of the usual policy of the company, to be thereafter delivered. *Karelsen v. 7. Bradley v. Nashville Ins. Co., 3 La. Ann. 708, 48 Am. Dec. 465.

If the Policy Does Not Conform to the Previous Agreement, the applicant may refuse to accept it, and recover back any money he may have paid in premiums;¹ or if he has accepted it, supposing it to conform to his contract with the insurer, a court of equity will reform it in a proper case.²

bb. VALIDITY — (aa) In General. — It is not essential to the validity of a contract of insurance that the person to be insured thereby should be named in the policy. If the name of the person for whose benefit the insurance is obtained does not appear upon the face of the policy, or if the designation used is applicable to several persons, or if the description of the assured is imperfect or ambiguous, so that it cannot be understood without explanation, resort to extrinsic evidence may be had in order to ascertain the meaning of the contract. And when thus ascertained, it will be held to apply to the interests intended to be covered by it; and they will be deemed to be comprehended within it who were in the minds of the parties when the contract was made.³

(bb) Conditions — At Common Law. — The contract of insurance is a voluntary one, and in the absence of statute the insurers have the right to incorporate in their policy whatever conditions it may please them to impose.⁴ If the assured objects to them he is under no obligation to consummate the contract;⁵ but if he assents to them, by accepting the policy or otherwise, the insurer has the right to insist upon a due observance of these conditions and to the benefit of every restriction and limitation upon his liability provided for in the contract.⁶

By Statute. — But many of the states, by the adoption of a standard policy, have protected the insured from the imposition of onerous and unreasonable conditions, and though a policy containing a clause not provided for in the standard policy is not void, it is voidable at the option of the insured.⁷

(cc) Execution — Signature of Officers. — In some jurisdictions it is held to be necessary, in order that the policy may take effect as a valid written contract, that it should be signed by the proper officers of the corporation and countersigned by the issuing agent.⁸ If the policy itself provides for the mode of its execution, this mode must be complied with.⁹ But in other jurisdictions it has been held that notwithstanding the express terms of the policy, its execution in the prescribed manner is not under all circumstances essential to its validity. On an equitable interpretation of the whole transaction, it may become the duty of the court to dispense with a portion of the forms of the contract, if it can find any reliable substitute for them, on the principle which cures defective execution of powers where the intention to execute is sufficiently plain. Hence it has been held to be no objection to the validity of

Mistake in Name of Assured Cured by Indorsement. — The fact that one who has no interest in property is mistakenly named as the assured in the policy of insurance thereon does not invalidate it, if, by subsequent indorsement made by the insurer, with notice of the mistake, the loss, if any, is made payable to the mortgagee named in the indorsement. *Solms v. Where a Policy Provides for Its Being Countersigned by the Agent, it is not valid without such countersigning. Lynn v. Burgoyne, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 400. See also Noyes v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 1 Mo. App. 584.

That a policy of life insurance shall be countersigned by the agent of the company before it shall become a valid obligation is a stipulation which the company has a right to make, and the completion of the contract with the signature of such agent during the lifetime of the insured is essential to the existence of an obligation which can be enforced against the company. Newcomb v. Provident Fund Soc., 5 Colo. App. 140. Badger v. American Popular L. Ins. Co., 103 Mass. 244, 4 Am. Rep. 547.

the instrument that it was signed by officers who had ceased to be such at the time when the policy was issued,¹ or that it was not countersigned by the insurer's agent, though this was expressly required by the terms of the policy.²

Sealing Policies. — The failure of an insurance company to attach its common seal to an insurance policy will not invalidate it in the absence of a requirement to that effect in the company's charter.³ But it has been held that if the charter of the insurance company provides that its policies shall be sealed, an unsealed policy cannot be introduced in evidence to recover in an action for the premium.⁴

(dd) Delivery and Acceptance — aaa. Necessity of. — If all the terms of a contract have been agreed upon between the parties, the formal delivery of the policy by the insurer and its acceptance by the insured are not essential to its validity;⁵ but if the terms have not been agreed upon, or if the application provides, and if it is a condition of the policy itself, that it shall not become effective until it is delivered to the applicant, the contract of insurance will not become binding until such delivery.⁶

bbb. Sufficiency of — Manual Delivery of Policy Not Essential. — Whether an insurance policy has or has not been delivered after its issuance so as to complete the contract and give it binding effect, does not depend upon its manual possession by the assured, but rather upon the intention of the parties as manifested by their acts or agreement.⁷ As a general rule, whenever one parts with the custody and control of anything with the intention at the time that it shall pass into the possession of another, its delivery to such other person has, in contemplation of law, become complete. The manual possession of the thing which it is intended to deliver is a matter of little consequence. Such possession may exist without any legal delivery, and it may not exist where a legal delivery has been effected. The controlling question is not who has the actual possession of the policy, but who has the right of possession.⁸

8. What Is Delivery. — New York L. Ins. Co. v. Babcock, 104 Ga. 67.

What Is Not Delivery. — Where the agreement between the applicant and the insurance agent was that the latter should forward the policy to the address of the former, who, if the policy was found to be as agreed, was to send the premium, otherwise to return the policy, and the policy never reached the applicant, but the letter containing it was returned undelivered, it was held that there was no delivery of the

Leaving Policy with Agent. — While the agent cannot act for both parties in making a contract of insurance, he can act as custodian of the policy until called for by the insured.¹ The insured may leave the policy with the agent to be kept in his safe, and the delivery of the policy is not less complete because it remains in the agent's safe until after loss.² So the assured may leave the policy in the hands of the agent subject to the order and control of a third person.³

The Delivery of the Policy to the Broker through whom the application was made, to be delivered by him to the assured, is sufficient, although the applicant died while the policy was yet in the broker's hands.⁴

Acceptance by Applicant. — If the applicant receives the policy and retains it without objection, this is to be construed as an acceptance of it by him.⁵

ccc. Effect of — Merger of Preliminary Contract. — The policy of insurance is the final contract between the parties, and the effect of its acceptance is to supersede all preliminary agreements in respect to insurance.⁶ It is a well-settled principle of law that parol declarations cannot be received to vary or contradict the terms of a written contract. All that was said between the contracting parties in relation to the terms and stipulations of the contract is presumed to have been merged in the written contract, which is the highest and best evidence of the contract between the parties, in the absence of any evidence as to fraud, accident, or mistake, at the time of its execution, delivery, and acceptance by the contracting parties.⁷

Assent to Conditions. — The applicant, by accepting the policy, assents to all its conditions, and they are just as obligatory upon him as though he had signed the policy.⁸ Having an opportunity to read it, he is presumed to know the contents thereof, and in the absence of fraud or mistake he will not be heard to say that he was ignorant of its contents.⁹

f. CONSIDERATION — PREMIUM — (1) In General. — The contract of insurance, like every other contract, must have a consideration to support it.¹ This is usually fixed by the express agreement of the parties, but it is not essential that it should be so fixed where there is an established rate for property of the character and location of that designed to be insured, and the parties contracted with reference to this established rate.²

(2) Payment — (a) Necessity of — aa. IN GENERAL. — It is not necessary, however, that the premium should actually be paid, provided a condition of the policy does not make payment a prerequisite and the insurer does not insist upon it. The promise of the insured to pay, whether express or merely implied from the circumstances attending the delivery of the policy to him, is a valid consideration, and will support the contract.³ But no such promise can be implied unless the insured accepts the policy as an executed and binding contract.⁴ Whether there is in fact such an acceptance is a question of fact for the jury.⁵

Withholding Delivery of Policy. — Where the delivery of a policy is purposely withheld until the premium upon it is paid, the payment of the premium is obviously requisite to the consummation of the contract.⁶

bb. WHEN CONDITION OF POLICY REQUIRES — (aa) Validity of Requirement. — It is not uncommon, however, for policies of insurance to contain a stipulation that the contract shall not be binding until the premium is actually paid. Such a stipulation is valid, and the holder cannot recover for a loss while the premium remains unpaid, provided the insurer has not, by his conduct, waived compliance with it.⁷

Where One Policy Is Substituted for Another, and the agent, in transmitting the substituted policy to the assured, informs him that there is a small balance due on the premium, but makes no request for a prompt remittance, the omission of the assured to remit the amount does not invalidate the policy. Trundle v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co., 54 Mo. App. 188.

Enforcing Renewal of Policy. — If the assured, under a provision in his policy allowing its renewal for a term of three years, desires to avail himself of this privilege against the refusal of the insurer to renew, he must not only give notice of his desire, but must tender the renewal premium as well. American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case, 82 Md. 525.

Where there is no indication of any purpose to contract other than by a policy to be made and delivered upon payment of at least half of the premium, the fact that the insurance agent wrote the person seeking insurance, saying: "Your policy has come; the first time you are in town come around and get your policy," does not show a constructive delivery of the policy, a waiver of payment, and a consummation of the contract, neither does it show that the agent simply held the policy in trust for the insured. (bb) Waiver of Condition. — But such a stipulation, being entirely for the benefit of the insurer, will be considered waived by such conduct on his part as shows an intention not to insist upon its performance.¹

Unconditional Delivery of Policy. — Thus, if the insurer delivers the policy as a completed and executed contract under an express or implied agreement that a credit shall be given for the premium, it will be deemed that the stipulation has been waived.²

Power of Agent to Waive. — An agent authorized to make contracts of insurance and issue policies may thus waive the condition requiring payment of the premium, unless there are restrictions upon his authority of which the insured has notice;³ and this although the policy itself declares that agents have no

Submission of Question to Jury. — See Bowman v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 59 N. Y. 521, where it was held that the facts warranted a submission to the jury of the question whether the condition had been waived, and were sufficient to sustain a verdict in the plaintiff's favor.

authority to extend the time of payment of any premium.¹

(b) Mode of Payment — aa. PAYMENT IN CASH. — The payment contemplated by the contract is a payment of money; and it has been held that an agent's authority to collect premiums does not imply an authority to accept property in payment thereof in lieu of money.²

bb. cc. PAYMENT BY AGENT INDIVIDUALLY. — If the agent of an insurance company, upon his individual responsibility, extends credit for the premium to the assured, and pays the amount to or is charged with it by the company, such payment inures to the benefit of the assured and consummates the contract;⁴ and the fact that the amount advanced is not paid to the agent when due does not invalidate the policy.⁵ The agent may sue for and recover the

Where It Is the Custom of an Insurance Agent to Give Credit for premiums due, and the company, with knowledge of the agent's custom, receives and retains a premium when paid, it is estopped by its action from claiming the benefit of a clause in the policy making the actual payment of the premium a condition precedent to its binding force; and this although it is specially provided in the policy that no waiver shall be claimed by reason of anything done by any agent unless specially authorized in writing. *Tennant v. Payment in Fees. — An application for life insurance declared that the policy should not be binding until the first premium should have been received by the company during the lifetime and good health of the person insured. The agent of the company contracted with the insured that the first year's premium was to be paid in services to be rendered by the insured to the company as medical examiner, and that if such services exceeded the first year's premium a credit was to be entered for the excess on that of the next. The insured died during the first year, having rendered services as medical examiner to the time of his death, but the fees did not amount to the first year's premium. It was held that the agent exceeded his authority in making the contract, and that the beneficiary of the policy was not entitled to recover thereon. *Carter v. Cotton States L. Ins. If the agent pays the premium to the company, but collects from the assured a part of the premium only, and holds the policy as security for payment of the remainder, the insurer will nevertheless be liable. Wheeler v. Watertown F. Ins. Co., 131 Mass. 1.

Two provisions in a contract between a life insurance company and an agent, one expressly withholding from the agent authority to give credit for premiums, the other stating that agents crediting premiums not actually received do so at their own risk, will be construed together to mean, not that the agent may not give credit upon his own responsibility, but that he cannot give credit for the company. Smith v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc., 31 U. S. App. 163.

The fact that the agent is charged by an insurance company with the amount of the premium is a mere matter of account between the insurer and the agent, and if the transaction between the agent and the insured does not constitute a binding contract, so as to entitle the agent to bring an action against the insured for the premium, the agent's payment to the company does not accrue to the benefit of the insured, and he cannot ratify it after a loss has occurred. Van Wert v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 90 Hun (N. Y.) 465.

5. Nonpayment of Note Given to Agent Individually. — Where an agent of an insurance company is not authorized to take anything except money in payment of premiums, but amount in his own name.¹

Application of Debt Due by Agent. — If an agent, in his individual capacity, owes money to the assured, or has in his possession money belonging to him, it has been held that the agent's agreement to apply such money to the payment of the premium is equivalent to payment, and binds the company;² but there are cases to the contrary.³

(c) To Whom Made — aa. PAYMENT TO AGENT. — Agreeably to the principles of the law of agency, payment of the premium to an agent of the insurance company is payment to the company;⁴ and a notice printed on the back of a policy that payment to an agent will not be deemed valid unless a receipt signed by certain specified officers of the company is received at the time, does not limit the rule.⁵

If an Unauthorized Person Solicits an Application for insurance, and the insurance company recognizes the regularity of the application and the legitimacy of the channel through which it came, such person becomes the agent of the company, and the payment of the premium to such agent is a payment to the company.⁶

bb. PAYMENT TO BROKER. — The rule is well established that in the absence of extrinsic proof the insurance broker is held to be the agent of the insured, and the payment of a premium to the broker is not payment to the insurer; and if the broker misapplies the amount, the insurer may recover of the insured the premium for which the broker failed to account.⁷

But if the Insurer Keeps an Account with the Broker, and treats him as its debtor for premiums received by him, a payment to such broker is equivalent to payment to the company.⁸

upon his own responsibility takes the note of a policy holder, and becomes individually liable to the insurance company for the premium, the nonpayment of the note at maturity does not avoid the policy. Griffith v. New York L. Ins. Co., 101 Cal. 627, 40 Am. St. Rep. 96.

If the Insurance Agent Owes to the Insured a Sum Less than the Amount of the Premium, and the insured is told by the agent to pay to him the excess of the premium over the amount owed by him, and that he will pay to the company the full amount of the premium, and if the insured, in entire good faith, does as instructed, he has the right to assume that the agent will pay the premium to the insurance company, and is not bound to see that it is done. *Kerlin v. If an insurance company delivers a policy to an agent to be delivered to the assured, the fact gives to the agent an apparent authority to receive payment of the premium, and payment to him will bind the company. Gosch v. State Mut. F. Ins. Assoc., 44 Ill. App. 263.

Payment to Surviving Partner. — Where the agency of an insurance company is given to two persons, not as individuals, but as partners composing a firm, the agency of the firm ceases upon the death of one member of it, and cannot be exercised by the survivor, either in the name of the firm or of himself individually, and the payment of a premium to the survivor does not bind the insurance company. *Martine v. 6. Terry v. Provident Fund Soc., 13 Ind. App. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 217; Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. v. Erb, 112 Pa. St. 149.

Collection of Note by Unauthorized Person. — Where a note given for a premium is made payable at the home office of the company, the agent of the company, though he has authority to solicit applications for insurance, counter-sign and deliver policies, and receive and transmit premiums, has no authority to receive payment of a note which is not in his possession, and which he has not been called upon by the company to collect. *Long Creek Bldg. 8. Greenwich Ins. Co. v. Union Dredging Co., 14 Daly (N. Y.) 237.

Under the Revised Statutes of Ohio (now Bates's Annot. Stat. 1897, § 3644), an insurance broker is to be considered the agent of the insurer, so that a payment of premium to him

The Fact that the Insurance Policy Provides that any broker procuring it shall be deemed the agent of the insured and not of the insurer, and that the payment of a premium to any one except the insurers or their agent shall be at the risk of the insured, is therefore not conclusive on the question of such agency. Whether such broker was or was not the agent of the insurer is a question of fact.¹ The question should not, however, be left to the jury when there is no evidence to support a finding that such broker was the agent of the insurer.²

(3) Suspension of Policy for Nonpayment of Premium Note — (a) Insurer Not Liable During Default. — A stipulation in an insurance policy that the company shall not be liable for any loss or damage sustained by the insured while a note given for the premium remains due and unpaid is one which the company has the right to make, and, if inserted without any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, is binding upon the insured. The nonpayment of the note does not extinguish the policy, but defeats the right of the holder to recover for any loss occurring during its discontinuance. The subsequent payment of the note revives the policy for the remainder of the term, but for a loss occurring during the default no recovery can be had, notwithstanding the subsequent payment.³

Waiver of Stipulation. — Such a stipulation is, however, for the benefit of the insurer, and may be waived by him.⁴

But an Insurance Agent authorized to receive applications and collect premiums has no authority to grant an extension of time for the payment of an installment on a premium note and to waive a provision of the policy suspending the operation of the contract during such default.⁵

Notice. — Ordinarily the insurance company is under no obligation to give notice of the maturity of the premium note or to make demand for its payment. The insured ought to know when it matures, and provide for its payment.⁶

(b) Revival of Policy — Partial Payment. — Where the operation of a policy is is payment to the insurer. Central Ohio Ins. Co. v. Lake Erie Provision Co., 13 Ohio Cir. Ct. 661, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 562.

Where the insurer's agent delivers a policy to the insured through an insurance broker to whom the insured has paid the premium, the insurer will be liable for a loss occurring prior to the transmission of the premium in the usual course of business by the broker to the agent, although the policy provides that it shall not be binding until the actual cash payment of the premium. *Riley v. suspended during the default of the insured in the payment of his premium note, a partial payment thereon does not revive the policy in the absence of an agreement with the insured that it should so operate.¹

(4) Forfeiture of Policy for Nonpayment of Premium Note. — Policies of insurance sometimes provide that in case any note or obligation given for the premium shall not be paid at maturity, such failure of payment shall terminate the insurance, and the note or obligation shall be considered the premium for the risk thus terminated. Where such a condition is imposed, there can be no recovery for a loss occurring after default.²

Waiver. — The insurer's waiver of the forfeiture of the policy for nonpayment of the premium may, however, be inferred from conduct inconsistent with the purpose to insist thereon,³ and any agent duly authorized to issue policies may waive the forfeiture.⁴ Thus, the forfeiture will be considered waived by the subsequent receipt of the premium by the insurer without objection,⁵ except in a case where the insurer was ignorant that a loss had already occurred;⁶ but the mere demand for the payment of an overdue premium, without its payment, is not sufficient to reinstate the forfeited policy.⁷

3. Interpretation and Construction — a. GENERAL PRINCIPLES — (1) Interpretation to Be Made by Court. — It is a firmly established and universally recognized rule of law that the construction of a written instrument is a question of law for the court; and where there is no ambiguity or conflicting inference of the language of the insurance policy when applied to the undisputed facts, it is error to leave its interpretation to the jury.⁸

(2) General Rules of Construction. — The same general rule of construction which applies to other instruments applies equally to policies of insurance;⁹ that is, they are to be construed agreeably to the intention of the parties.¹⁰

Interpretation of Terms Used. — This intention is in the first place to be drawn from the language of the instrument.¹¹ The words employed are themselves

10. Policies of Insurance Are Rarely Subjected to Any Critical Construction, and the intent is regarded, rather than any grammatical accuracy in the use of language. Bradley v. Nashville Ins. Co., 3 La. Ann. 708, 48 Am. Dec. 465.

"In the interpretation of conditions inserted in and making a part of the contract by insurers, and in language chosen by them, care should be taken that a strained and unnatural effect should not be given to words and terms to the prejudice of the insured; and in no case should they be extended by implication so as to embrace cases not clearly or reasonably within the very words of the condition, as such words are ordinarily used and understood." Rann v. Home Ins. Co., 59 N. Y. 387.

The meaning and intent of insurance contracts, like all others, is to be obtained first from the language employed, and if by settled rules of construction the intent is not clear from the language itself, then resort to the surrounding to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally, in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usages of trade, or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words, or unless the context evidently points out that they must in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense.¹

Conditions Prescribing Forfeitures Strictly Construed. — Every condition and provision in an insurance policy the breach of which involves a forfeiture of the contract is to be construed strictly.²

(3) When Terms Admit of Two Constructions. — If the terms of a policy are capable of two interpretations equally reasonable, it is the general rule that that construction which is most favorable to the insured must be adopted. As it is the company that prepares the contract, the insured not being consulted with regard to the form thereof, all doubts in regard to its meaning must be solved against the company.³

circumstances existing at the time when the contract was entered into may be had in order to solve the difficulty and to dispel any obscurity. Savage v. Howard Ins. Co., (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 44 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 40.

Custom, or the Course of Dealing Between the Parties, may sometimes be considered in order to interpret what is doubtful in the policy of insurance, but not to contradict plain and ambiguous stipulations. Waxahachie First Nat. Bank v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 62 Tex. 461.

The Fact that the Policy Was Issued by a Mutual Company to one of its members gives to words used for a definite purpose and applied to transactions of a clearly defined character no significance different from what would be their fair construction in a similar contract between any parties. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 99 Mass. 317.

1. Robertson v. French, 4 East 135; Ripley v. Aetna Ins. Co., 30 N. Y. 136, 86 Am. Dec. 362.

Usage of Trade. — It is a rule of construction settled by numerous authorities, that every usage of trade which is so well settled or so generally known that all persons engaged in that trade may fairly be considered as contracting with reference to it is regarded as forming part of every policy designed to protect risks in that trade, unless by the express terms of the policy or by necessary implication such inference is repelled. Mobile Marine Dock, etc., Ins. Co. v. McMillan, 27 Ala. 77.

But while usage is admissible to explain an ambiguity, it is never received to contradict what is plain in the written contract. Hearne v. Marine Ins. Co., 20 Wall. (U. S.) 488.

Forfeitures Not Favored. — In construing a contract of the parties and their acts in connection therewith, the rule is to avoid a forfeiture when it may be fairly done. *McMaster v. New York L. Ins. Construction of Standard Policy. — To what extent this rule of construction is to be modified when the policy is in the standard form prescribed by state authorities, does not seem to have been settled; but it may be assumed that the terms used in the standard policy are to be construed in the sense in which they had previously been defined by the courts.¹

(4) Construction of Printed and Written Parts. — Effect is to be given, if possible, to all parts of a policy, both printed and written. No part of the policy is to be rejected as insensible or inoperative if a rational or intelligent meaning can be given to it, consistent with the general design and object of the whole instrument.² If, however, there should be any reasonable doubt upon the sense and meaning of the whole, that part which is superadded in writing is entitled to have a greater effect attributed to it than to the printed part, inasmuch as the written words are the immediate language and terms selected by the parties themselves for the expression of their meaning, while the printed words are a general formula adapted equally to their case and to that of all other contracting parties upon similar occasions and subjects.³

(5) Construction of Attached Clauses and General Conditions. — For the same reason, a manifest inconsistency between the provisions of a policy and a mortgage clause attached thereto will be resolved in favor of the clause.⁴

(6) Memorandum Construed as Part of Policy. — A memorandum attached to the face⁵ or entered upon the margin⁶ of an insurance policy prior to its execution and delivery is to be regarded as a part of the contract.

An Indorsement on the Back of a Policy may be regarded as part of the contract, provided it is referred to in the policy as constituting a part thereof; but if

Where an Act Prescribing a Standard Policy of Insurance Is Declared Unconstitutional, a policy issued in the form prescribed by the act must be regarded as depending for its validity and construction wholly upon the consent of the parties, and not as a policy prescribed by the authority of the state. Flatley v. Co. v. Flemming, 65 Ark. 54.

An insurance policy upon a stock of general merchandise "such as is usually kept for sale in country stores" will not be avoided by a clause in the printed portion of the policy prohibiting the keeping of benzine or fireworks, if these articles form a part of the stock of such stores. *Tubb v. there be no reference whatever to it in the policy, and nothing to show that the parties meant it to be a part of the contract, it will be regarded merely as an act of the insurer, and therefore not binding on the insured.¹

5. CONSTRUING CONTENTS OF OTHER INSTRUMENTS AS PART OF CONTRACT — (1) Application and Survey. — In order to constitute an application or survey upon which a policy of insurance is issued, a part thereof, the two instruments must be so connected as to make them in legal effect one contract.²

Application Need Not Be Attached to Policy. — In the absence of statute, it is not essential that the application should be attached to the policy.³

Must Be Referred to in Policy. — But there should be in the policy some reference to it which evidences that the parties understood and accepted it as part of the contract.⁴ A mere indication in the policy of the place where the application can be found on file is not such a reference to it as to make it a part of the policy.⁵

Statutes. — By statute in some of the states it is provided that no application or representation made by the insured shall be considered a part of the contract unless a copy of such application or representation is attached to or indorsed upon the policy.⁶

1. Indorsements. — Fetzer v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 47 Cal. 416; Planters' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rowland, 66 Md. 236; Kingsley v. New England Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. (Mass.) 393; *Stone v. U. S. Where a policy is issued subject to answers contained in the application "indorsed" upon the policy, the word "indorsed" is not to be construed in the technical sense, but applies to a copy of the application attached to the back of the policy with mucilage or some other similar substance. *Reynolds v. 6. Statutes Requiring Application to Be Attached — Massachusetts. — Acts Mass. 1893, c. 434, § 1; Acts Mass. 1894, c. 522, § 73; Considine v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 165 Mass. 462.

Iowa Statute. — Acts Eighteenth General Assembly, c. 211, § 2; Code Iowa (1897), § 1741; MacKinnon v. Mutual F. Ins. Co., 89 Iowa 170.

Application of Statute. — Although this act is entitled, "An act relating to insurance and fire-insurance companies," it has been held that it applies to life insurance as well. Cook v. Federal L. Assoc., 74 Iowa 746. It has also been held to apply to mutual life-insurance companies on the assessment plan, although neither that nor any similar provision is found in the Laws of 1886, c. 65, which regulates mutual benefit associations. McConnell v. Iowa Mut. Aid Assoc., 79 Iowa 757; Grimes v. Northwestern Legion of Honor, 97 Iowa 315.

Extraterritorial Effect. — Questions affecting remedies upon contract are governed by the law of the place where the suit is brought; hence where an action is brought in the courts of Colorado upon a contract of insurance made in Iowa, it is error to refuse to allow the introduction in evidence of the application, and evidence to show its false representation, because the copy of the application was not attached to or indorsed on the policy, as required by the statutes of the latter state. Des Moines L. Assoc. v. Owen, 10 Colo. App. 131.

Sufficiency of Copy. — Such copy need not be a facsimile, but must be so exact that on comparison it may be said to be a true copy, without resorting to construction. Johnson v. Des Moines L. Ins. Co., 105 Iowa 273.

The substitution, in a purported copy of an application for life insurance, of "children" for "mother," as a term of relationship, the omission of a question as to the amount of other insurance in the same company, the consolidation of several questions into one, the setting out of answers to questions not given in the original, and the insertion of questions as to the details of general questions in the original are such variations as to require construction; and hence such a copy is not a true one. Johnson v. Des Moines L. Ins. Co., 105 Iowa 273.

Where the purported copy of an application for reinstatement, attached to the policy, omits the examiner's report contained in the original, and also a part of the statements made by the assured in regard to his previous physical condition, and incorrectly states the place to which notices of premiums shall be addressed, it is not a copy as contemplated by the statute. Goodwin v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Assoc., 97 Iowa 226, 59 Am. St. Rep. 411.

A Special Report of a Medical Examiner is not a part of the "application or representation of the assured." Johnson v. Des Moines L. Ins. Co., 105 Iowa 273.

Signature of Applicant. — The attachment to an insurance policy of a copy of the application, followed by the word "signed," but without the signature of the applicant, does not entitle the company to rely on any part of such application. Seiler v. Economic L. Assoc., 105 Iowa 88.

Subsequent Delivery of Application. — If the survey and application are properly referred to and identified in the policy, the fact that they were not furnished until after the policy was delivered will not affect their validity as a part of the contract.¹ But if the policy is issued without any agreement to execute an application, the liability of the insurer cannot be qualified or defeated by the conditions of an application subsequently delivered,² unless there is a new consideration for the making of such application.³

Effect of Construction as One Contract. — When the application is referred to in the policy or attached thereto, and expressly made a part thereof, its conditions, representations, and warranties are as binding upon the insured as though they were set forth in the policy itself;⁴ and this although the application

Wisconsin Statute. — The Wisconsin statute (Stat. Wis. 1898, § 1945a), is a counterpart of that of Iowa. It has been held under this statute that a copy of the application for insurance which does not contain a copy of the applicant's name appended thereto is insufficient. Dunbar v. Phenix Ins. Co., 72 Wis. 492.

This statute is binding upon a foreign corporation insuring property situated in the state, although the contract of insurance was made in another state. Stanhilber v. Mutual Mill Ins. Co., 76 Wis. 285.

Pennsylvania Statute. — The Pennsylvania Act of May 11, 1881, provides that unless a copy of the application as signed by the insured is annexed to or contained in the policy, such application shall not be received in evidence nor considered a part of the contract between the parties. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 144 Pa. St. 79, 27 Am. St. Rep. 618; Mahon v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 144 Pa. St. 409.

Application of Statute. — The terms of the statute limit its operation to "life and fire insurance policies," and therefore it does not apply to accident policies. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co. v. Carroll, 86 Fed. Rep. 567; National Acc. Soc. v. Dolph, 94 Fed. Rep. 743.

But an endowment policy is life insurance within the meaning of the statute. Hendei v. Reverting Fund Assur. Assoc., 2 Pa. Dist. 116.

The statute does not apply to mutual benefit associations. Donlevy v. Supreme Lodge, etc., 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 477.

This act applies to policies issued by companies incorporated under the laws of Pennsylvania on property situated in another state. Hebb v. Kittanning Ins. Co., 138 Pa. St. 174.

The Purpose of the Statute is the protection of the assured, and the company cannot invoke the act to exclude an application offered in evidence by the beneficiary. Norristown Title Co. v. Hancock Ins. Co., 132 Pa. St. 385.

The Application Contemplated is one in writing, and the statute does not apply to any oral application. Lenox v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 165 Pa. St. 575.

Sufficiency of Copy. — The copy which is attached to the policy must conform to the original in all material particulars, and a mere statement copied on to the policy at the end thereof, without any signature, does not fulfil the statutory requirement. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Hallock, (Pa. 1888) 14 Atl. Rep. 167.

So where the medical examiner's report is made a part of the application, but is not contained in the copy of the application attached to the policy, the application is not attached to the policy within the meaning of the Act of May 11, 1881, P. L. 20, and is not admissible in evidence. Morris v. State Mut. L. Assur. Co., 183 Pa. St. 563.

Must Be Attached. — Furthermore, the application must be attached to the policy; if it is not attached it will not be considered a part of the contract, although the policy expressly provides that it shall be so considered. Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 117 Pa. St. 460, 2 Am. St. Rep. 686.

may be written in lead pencil upon the blank of another company,¹ and though the insured mistakenly supposes that the policy refers to a different application.²

Parol Evidence. — If the statements made in an application for insurance are unambiguous, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or contradict them.³

Policy Inadmissible Without Application. — The policy is inadmissible in evidence without the application, when it is within the power of the insurer to produce it.⁴

(2) Conditions of Premium Note. — Where an insurance policy and a premium note are executed contemporaneously, concern the same parties, and relate to the same subject-matter, such policy and note constitute parts of the same contract and must be so construed in determining the rights of the parties.⁵

Inconsistent Conditions. — But where the conditions of the policy and of the note are inconsistent, the terms of the policy must govern; hence, where the policy provides that the contract shall be nonforfeitable after a complete annual premium has been paid, no effect will be given to a stipulation in the note that a failure to pay interest shall forfeit the policy.⁶

(3) Charter and By-laws of Mutual Insurance Companies. — The charter and by-laws of a mutual insurance company are a part of the insurance contract, and as binding upon the insured as the conditions of the policy itself.⁷

c. CONSTRUING SEVERAL POLICIES ON SAME SUBJECT-MATTER. — Where several policies on the same property are taken out in different companies without any relation to each other, they are independent contracts, and a policy in one company cannot be received in evidence to explain or vary what is contained in another.⁸ But where two applications for insurance upon different portions of the same subject-matter are made at the same time, and two policies are issued by the same company, they may be construed together,

The Insurer May Be Estopped by His Acceptance of an Application not signed by the applicant from afterwards setting up that fact as a ground for denial of liability on the policy. Pickett v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. App. Div. 114.

The agent of the defendant company received from the plaintiff's husband a written application for a life-insurance policy. Without the knowledge of the applicant the agent copied the application upon the blank of another company, of which he had subsequently become the agent, and the second company accepted the application in this form and issued a policy upon it. It was held that it was estopped by its action from denying its liability on the ground that the application had not been signed by the applicant. Bohringer v. Empire Mut. L. Ins. Co., 2 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 610.

Assured Estopped from Denying Application. — The acceptance of a policy of insurance expressly referring to the application filed in the office, and making it a part of the policy, estops the assured from denying that the application is his, and he cannot set up that it was made by an agent employed by him to procure insurance upon his property, but without authority to bind him by representations in the application. *Draper v. so as to effect the indemnity intended, if the construction of each by itself would lead to an absurd result.¹

4. Modification of Contract. — A policy of insurance may be modified by a new and distinct agreement subsequently entered into by the parties or their authorized agents.²

5. Renewal of Policy — a. IN GENERAL. — Ordinarily every renewal of a policy of insurance is a new contract³ subject to the laws in force at the time when it is effected.⁴ A policy of fire insurance may, however, continue itself by its own terms on the payment of the premium and taking a receipt therefor; and in this case an action may be brought on the original policy.⁵ So where a policy is issued to insure the life of a person for the term of life, in consideration of the premium paid and to be paid in each year during the continuance of the contract, the payment of each annual premium does not create a new contract, but is merely a continuance of the old one.⁶

Power of Agent to Renew. — As a general rule an agent who has power to make a contract of insurance has power to renew it.⁷ The possession and use by an agent of certificates of renewal, together with the exercise of that authority in other instances, indicates that the power of renewing and continuing insurance has been conferred upon him.⁸

b. HOW EFFECTED. — To effect a renewal of a policy, it is necessary that the minds of the parties should meet upon all the essentials of the contract to the same extent as was required for its creation in the first instance. A proposition for renewal, unless accepted by the party to whom it is made, is nothing more than a mere offer, and does not create a binding contract of renewal.⁹

1. Schreiber v. German-American Hail Ins. Co., 43 Minn. 367.

2. Modification of Contract. — Willcuts v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co., 81 Ind. 300.

In Leonard v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co., 65 Conn. 529, the plaintiff was the beneficiary under a policy of life insurance issued by the defendant company. By the terms of the policy the company agreed to pay upon the death of the assured ten thousand dollars, "deducting therefrom the amount of all unpaid notes given for premiums." After its issuance the beneficiary and the assured agreed with the company to scale the amount to six thousand dollars, and that it should be "taken in all respects as if it had been originally issued for the sum of six thousand dollars." In an action upon the policy it was held that the beneficiary was entitled to recover only the sum of six thousand dollars, less the amount of unpaid premium notes.

"A written bargain is of no higher legal degree than a parol one. Either may vary or discharge the other, and there can be no more force in an agreement in writing not to agree by parol than in a parol agreement not to agree in writing. Every such agreement is ended by the new one which contradicts it." Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Earle, 33 Mich. 153.

What Is Not Modification. — A steam boiler insurance company issued a policy on seven boilers of a manufacturing establishment. Afterwards, the manufacturer installed two additional boilers, and these were inspected by the insurance company. In a conversation between the inspector and the manufacturer the former stated that he considered the two additional boilers to be covered by the policy, the policy being intended to cover any seven boilers that might be in use at the time of an explosion. One of the additional boilers afterward exploded, and in an action upon the policy for the loss it was held that the statement of the inspector did not constitute a modification of the policy. Laclede F. Brick Mfg. Co. v. Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection, etc., Co., 19 U. S. App. 510.

An Alteration May Be Made by Subsequent Agreement Between the Parties to It, in a material part of a policy of insurance, by incorporating it in the body of the policy above the signature of the president and the corporate seal of the company, where the amount of the insurance is not increased by the alteration, provided the policy is afterwards redelivered, so altered, either in fact or in contemplation of law, to the other party, with the knowledge and consent of the company. *Hoffecker v. Terms and Conditions. — Unless otherwise expressed, the new contract will be construed to be subject to the terms and conditions contained in the original policy.¹

Description of Property Insured. — When the description of the property is general it must, however, if possible, be so construed as to cover the property according to its condition and location at the date of the last renewal.²

Change of Parties Insured. — The renewal receipt may be so framed as to change the parties insured and yet leave the contract in all other respects unaltered.³

Mode of Renewal. — An insurance contract is ordinarily renewed either by the execution of another policy or by the issuance of a renewal slip. This slip need not be under seal, although the original policy is so.⁴ On the contrary, the insurance company may, through its authorized agent, contract for the renewal of the policy by parol,⁵ and this notwithstanding it is stipulated in the policy itself that this shall not be done.⁶

c. BREACH OF CONTRACT TO RENEW. — An action may be maintained for a breach of contract to renew a policy of insurance,⁷ and in such action the policy is admissible in evidence to show the terms of the contract sued upon.⁸

6. Reformation of Policy — a. POWER OF EQUITY TO REFORM. — When a policy of insurance as issued does not conform to the contract which it purports to evidence, and the insured accepts the policy in the belief that it does conform to his contract, a court of equity will reform the instrument.⁹

London Assur. Corp., (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 5 N. Y. Supp. 360, 101 N. Y. 575.

Term of Renewal. — A policy was issued for one year at an annual premium of thirty dollars. It was renewed for a second year on the payment of a like premium. Upon an agreement for a second renewal the same amount of premium was paid, but the testimony does not show that anything was said as to the time for which the renewed policy was to run. It was held that the renewal was to be construed as being for the term of one year. Scott v. Home Ins. Co., 53 Wis. 238.

Estoppel by Act of Agent. — After a loss has occurred, an insurance company will be estopped to allege that the policy was not renewed, where its agent had represented to the insurer that the policy had been renewed, and had accepted the premium for such extended insurance. International Trust Co. v. Norwich Union F. Ins. Soc., 36 U. S. App. 277.

Failure of Agent to Renew Insurance. — In Idaho Forwarding Co. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 8 Utah 41, it appeared that the plaintiff's cashier was also the agent of the defendant, and through his agency several policies of insurance were issued to the plaintiff. When these were about to expire, he was told by the plaintiff's manager to renew the policies, and was authorized to use the funds of the plaintiff to do so. Through the agent's negligence, the policies were not renewed. It was held that no contract of insurance existed, although the agent had authority to issue the policy.

An Oral Agreement by an Insurance Agent with a person to whom he is issuing a policy, that he will never suffer the insurance to lapse, but will give notice when it is about to lapse, and will renew the insurance in the same or in some other company represented by him, is not binding upon the company which issued such policy, unless the agent was acting within his actual or apparent authority for such company and it was so understood by the insured, or the contract was afterwards ratified. It is the contract of the agent in his personal capacity. Wood v. Prussian Nat. Ins. Co., 99 Wis. 497.

Mississippi. — Phoenix F. Ins. Co. v. Hoffheimer, 46 Miss. 645.

The fact that the insured did not read the policy when delivered to him to see whether its terms were in conformity with the agreement is not such negligence as will defeat his right to reformation.¹

Reformation After Loss. — After a loss has occurred the reformation of the policy and judgment for the loss may be had in the same action.²

b. MISTAKE MUST BE MUTUAL. — The want of conformity must be occasioned by a mistake which is mutual and common to both parties to the instrument. A mistake on one side may be a ground for rescinding, but not for reforming, the contract. Where the minds of the parties have not met, there is no contract, and hence none to be rectified.³

c. EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT. — The insurance policy as issued and accepted is, however, prima facie the contract of the parties; and in order to have it reformed, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that a different contract was entered into from that which was reduced to writing, and this fact must be proved by clear and satisfactory evidence.⁴

Measure of Proof. — It is not sufficient that the plaintiff should prove this by a preponderance of evidence, but he must establish the fact by such evidence as to show conclusively that a mistake had been made and to satisfy the court and the jury of such mistake beyond a reasonable doubt.⁵

7. Cancellation and Rescission — a. BY ACT OF PARTIES THEMSELVES — (1) Cancellation of Valid Policies — (a) Right to Cancel in General. — The right of either party to a valid contract of insurance to cancel it at pleasure can accrue only in three ways: first, by a concurrent agreement with the other party to that effect; second, by a previous reservation of the right in the conditions of

Where All the Terms of a Contract Are Agreed Upon by the Parties, the insured has the right to assume that the policy will accurately conform to the agreement thus made; and if it does not so conform, the policy may be reformed in equity. Equitable Ins. Co. v. Hearne, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 494.

Duration of Insurance. — A court of equity has power to reform and cancel an insurance policy issued by mistake for a longer term than was intended by the parties, and to enjoin the prosecution of a suit at law upon it. North American Ins. Co. v. Whipple, 2 Biss. (U. S.) 418.

Omitting Indorsement. — The clerk of the insurer's agent, in making out a policy renewing an existing insurance, by inadvertence omitted the last indorsement on the old policy. The omission materially affected the amount of recovery in case of a loss, and was not discovered until after the loss of a portion of the property insured. It was held that the policy should be reformed by the insertion of such indorsement. Cochran Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Phoenix Ins. Co., (C. Pl.) Gen. T. 7 Misc. (N. Y.) 695.

Introducing Unusual Clause. — A condition in a policy of insurance that "if this policy is delivered to or presented for cancellation through, by, or in the interest of any other boiler insurance company, no return premium will be paid," will not be binding upon the assured if the condition was not incorporated in other policies formerly issued to the assured, and he had no knowledge of the condition in the policy in question, but, on the contrary, was led, by the representation of the company's agent, to suppose that no such condition existed. *Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection, etc., Co. v. the policy itself; and third, by a provision in the state insurance law permitting it.¹

(b) Cancellation by Mutual Agreement — aa. IN GENERAL. — It is quite clear that a policy may be canceled by the mutual consent of the parties, although the right to do so has not been expressly reserved.²

But an Agent Employed by the Assured to Procure Insurance has no power, after the delivery of the policy to his principal, to consent to its cancellation without express authority from him.³

bb. MODE OF CANCELLATION. — The precise mode in which the agreement is reached is immaterial. If both parties agree that a policy is to be canceled, transactions in reference thereto are to be construed reasonably and fairly, and in accordance with the evident understanding of the parties at the time.⁴ The surrender of the policy by the insured and the acceptance of it by the authorized agent of the insurer, with the intention on the part of both that it shall no longer be a contract, effects the cancellation of it.⁵

Indemnity Co.*, 115 Mich. 672; Von Wien v. Scottish Union, etc., Ins. Co., 118 N. Y. 94; Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wenger, 90 Pa. St. 220; Skillern v. Continental Ins. Co., (Tenn. Ch. 1897) 42 S. W. Rep. 180.

When Facts Do Not Show Cancellation. — In an action by a widow to recover a death claim under an accident policy issued to her husband, it appeared that about a month previous to the happening of the accident from which the death occurred, the decedent sustained another accident, in settlement for which the company paid to him the sum of twenty-five dollars. The printed receipt which he gave to the company stated that the payment was in full satisfaction and final settlement of any and all claims that the insured had or might have had against the company for loss resulting from injuries received on a certain specified day, under the policy (giving its number), "which is hereby surrendered." The policy was not delivered up to or demanded by the company, but was retained by the insured, and the time for which premiums had been paid to continue the policy in force had not expired. It was held that the words "which is hereby surrendered" were to be construed as referring to the particular claim described in the context, and as indicating the surrender of the rights of the insured under the policy as to that, and that alone. Martin v. Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co., 151 N. Y. 94.

Abandonment of Policy. — In an action on a policy issued by a mutual fire-insurance company, it appeared that several months prior to the fire the assured received notice of an assessment. He never paid the assessment, but immediately afterwards took out other insurance, for the purpose of supplying the place of the policy sued upon. There was other evidence tending to show that the assured did not intend to pay the assessment, and that his purpose was to abandon the policy. A finding that the policy had been abandoned was sustained on appeal. Jones v. Alliance Mut. F. Ins. Co., 174 Pa. St. 439.

The insured, after repeated requests for payment of the premium, surrendered the policy to the agent of the insurance company, without protest, or any pretense that she wanted to retain it, and made no tender of the premiums or further claim to the policy until after the property had been destroyed by fire. It was held that her acts constituted a surrender of the policy, and terminated the insurance. Van Wert v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 8 N. Y. App. Div. 107.

A Formal Surrender of the Policy is, however, not necessary, and is unimportant except as evidence.¹

cc. CONDITIONAL AGREEMENTS. — If the agreement to cancel is conditional, the insurer, if he relies upon such agreement to release him from liability on the policy, must show that the condition has been complied with.² If an insurance policy be surrendered for the purpose of having a new policy issued in its stead, the old policy is not canceled until the new policy takes effect.³

dd. CANCELLATION INDUCED BY FRAUD. — If the assured is induced to surrender the policy by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the insurer in regard to its validity, a bill will lie to revive it.⁴

(e) Cancellation by Right Reserved to Insurer — aa. IN GENERAL. — A clause in a policy of insurance authorizing the insurer to determine the insurance at any time by giving proper notice to that effect and refunding a ratable proportion of the premium is valid.⁵

The By-laws of a Mutual Insurance Company are a part of the insurance contract, and are as binding upon the insured as the conditions of the policy itself; and a by-law requiring the secretary to cancel any risk which in his opinion is unsafe is valid, and a cancellation effected thereunder is binding upon the insured.⁶

Fraudulent Cancellation. — The privilege reserved by the insurer to terminate the policy on notice cannot, however, be exercised under circumstances which would make it operate as a fraud on the insured, as in case of notice given pending an approaching conflagration, threatening to destroy the property insured,⁷ or, in the case of life insurance, after the insured has become so

2. Conditional Agreements. — Queen Ins. Co. v. Leonard, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 49, 9 Ohio Cir. Ct. 46.

3. If the insured leaves his policy with the insurer's agent, with the express understanding and for the sole purpose of having another policy issued in its place, it has been held that the old policy is not to be considered canceled until the new one is issued. Hickey v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 92 Hun (N. Y.) 192, 15 N. Y. App. Div. 224.

The owner of a boat, holding a time policy thereon having several months to run, the amount of which had been impaired by a partial but unadjusted loss, desiring to have his insurance restored to the original amount, with increased time and privileges, proposed to the underwriters to cancel the old policy and issue a new one for the former amount, with longer time and additional privileges, and requested them to send a new policy, offering to remit the increased premium arising from these changes. It was held that this was a proposition to continue the insurance with modifications of the existing policy, and must be accepted or rejected as an entirety. It did not authorize the insurers to cancel existing insurance and credit unearned premiums on outstanding premium notes without the assent of the insured. Wilkins v. Tobacco Ins. Co., 30 Ohio St. 317, 27 Am. Rep. 455.

4. Cancellation Induced by Fraud. — An insurance policy was issued on the life of the plaintiff's mother, payable to him if living; if not living, to her executor or administrator. Subsequently, during the last illness of the insured, the president and secretary of the insurance company, by falsely representing to the plaintiff that the insurance was speculative, and therefore void, induced him to surrender the policy on return of the premiums which he had paid in behalf of his mother, he having general charge of affairs. It was held that a bill would lie to revive the policy. Heinlein v. Imperial L. Ins. Co., 101 Mich. 250, 45 Am. St. Rep. 409.

5. Irwin v. National Ins. Co., 2 Disney (Ohio) 68.

A Binding Slip evidences the contract set forth in the policy of insurance ordinarily issued by the insurer, and if by the terms of the regular policy it is agreed that the insurance may be terminated at any time at the option of the insurer on giving notice to that effect and refunding the ratable proportion of the premium for the unexpired term of the policy, the insurer may terminate the insurance even before a policy is issued. Karelsen v. Sun Fire Office, 122 N. Y. 545; Lipman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 121 N. Y. 454.

Reduction of Insurance. — The provision in a policy that "this insurance may be terminated at any time at the option of the company, on giving notice to that effect, and refunding a ratable proportion of the premium," does not authorize a reduction in the amount of the insurance, and a notice of such reduction indorsed on the policy in the hands of a holder as collateral security, without notice to the assured, is not binding on him unless subsequently ratified. Western Assur. Co. v. Stoddard, 88 Ala. 606.

feeble in health that he cannot obtain desirable insurance upon his life in any other reputable company.¹

bb. MODE OF CANCELLATION — (aa) Conditions Must Be Strictly Complied With. — The conditions in the policy upon which the right of the insured to cancel it rests must be strictly construed; and in order to defeat an action on a policy upon the ground that it has been canceled, it must be shown either that these conditions have been faithfully complied with² or that the insured, knowing the facts, waived such compliance.³ An insurance company cannot rely partly on a mutual agreement to cancel and partly on the right reserved in the policy. It must pursue either one or the other of these modes.⁴

(bb) Notice of Cancellation — aaa. Necessity of. — Where an insurance company determines to cancel a risk, the insured is entitled to reasonable notice of such determination.⁵

If the Insurer Sends the Notice by Mail, the receipt of the notice by the insured, if denied, must be proven.⁶

Loss Payable to Mortgagee. — When, by the terms of the policy, the loss is made payable to a mortgagee of the insured premises, notice to such mortgagee of the cancellation of the policy is sufficient, and it is not necessary also to notify the owner.⁷

bbb. Form of Notice. — The form of the notice is immaterial. A direction to the agent to terminate the risk and cancel the policy, when communicated to the insured, is as effective as would be the most express notice that the policy had been terminated.⁸ The notice must not, however, be equivocal; it must be notice of an actual present cancellation, and not of an intention to cancel

Assignment of Insurance Company. — The act of an insurance company in making an assignment for the benefit of its creditors is not in any sense a notification to its policy holders that their policies from that date are canceled. Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co., 10 Mo. App. 393.

Forfeiture of Charter. — The repeal of a statute under which an insurance company is organized, by a subsequent act of the legislature which declares the charter of such insurance company forfeited unless the company complies with the provisions of the repealing act within a limited time, does not work the cancellation of policies of such company outstanding at the time of the passage of the latter act, though the company failed to comply with its provisions and thus forfeited its charter. *Manlove v. at a future time or upon the noncompliance of the insured with certain conditions.¹

ccc. Authority of Agent to Accept Notice — Authority of Agent Procuring Insurance. — The authority of a broker who is not a general agent to place and manage insurance on his principal's property, but who is employed especially to procure insurance on certain property, terminates with the procurement of the policy, and he has no authority to receive notice of cancellation so as to bind the insured.²

And a Condition in the Policy that the broker procuring the insurance shall be deemed to be the agent of the insured in any transaction relating to the insurance does not vary the rule, since the condition applies only to matters occurring before the issuing of the policy.³ So a stipulation that notice may be given to the assured "or to the person who may have procured this insurance to be taken" cannot be applied to a case where the same person acted as agent for both parties in procuring and issuing the policy, since it is contrary to public policy that one should thus occupy a position involving conflicting rights and duties.⁴

But if the Agent's Authority Is General in respect to the insurance of the property, or if the insured, to avoid the necessity of sending and returning policies as they are canceled and rewritten from time to time, leaves them with the agent, to whom authority to rewrite canceled or expired insurance is given, notice to such agent will be sufficient.⁵

After Agency Has Ceased. — A notice of cancellation served on the broker who

A notice from the insurer to the insured, directing her attention to the fact of a failure to pay the premium and to the canceled condition of her policy, is not a sufficient notice to terminate the policy. Savage v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 12 Mont. 458, 33 Am. St. Rep. 591.

In American F. Ins. Co. v. Brooks, 83 Md. 22, a notice that "the policy will be canceled on our books for nonpayment of premium on Dec. 6th, proximo, in accordance with the terms of the policy, unless payment be made before that date," was held to be ineffectual.

Where an insurance agent, on receiving instructions from his principal to cancel a policy, wrote to the insured requesting him to send in the policy for cancellation, and promising upon its receipt to refund to him his pro rata of the unearned premium, and the insured, acting upon the notice, sent the policy to the agent, but the property was destroyed while the policy was in the mail, it was held that there was no cancellation and that the insurer was liable. Southern Ins. Co. v. Williams, 62 Ark. 382.

as agent for the assured procured the policies, after his agency has ceased, is ineffectual.¹

ddd. Time of Notice. — The cancellation clause of many of the fire-insurance policies provides that the insurer shall give five days' notice to the insured, and consequently the policy does not expire until five days after the receipt of such notice. But where the condition of the policy is that the insurance may be terminated at any time by the company on giving notice to that effect to the insured, the notice, when given, terminates the contract eo instanti.²

(cc) Return of Unearned Premium — aaa. Necessity of. — The provision of the standard insurance policy authorizing the cancellation of the policy at the instance of the insurer requires, as a condition precedent, that in addition to giving the necessary notice the insurer must return or tender the unearned premium.³ But where the policy merely provides for a termination of the insurance upon notice, it seems that the giving of notice is all that is required. The repayment of the unearned premium is held to be merely an incident not affecting the main object, the termination of the contract, and is therefore not a prerequisite.⁴

bbb. Actual Tender Must Be Made. — When a tender of the premium is required, the insurer is bound to seek out the insured and tender to him the whole amount of the unearned premium due, and a statement in a notice that the unearned premium will be returned by the local agent of the insurer does not constitute a return or tender, and will not effect a cancellation,⁶ unless the subsequent

2. Time of Notice. — In Lipman v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 121 N. Y. 454, the defendant, in order to provide temporary insurance pending an inquiry as to the character of the risk, or any delay in issuing the policy, signed a "binding slip," which stated on whose account the insurance was made, the amount insured, the term of insurance, and the date, and that it was binding until the policy should be delivered at the office of the brokers who procured it to be signed. The defendant's officers, having inquired as to the risk, notified the plaintiff's brokers before one o'clock in the afternoon of the next day that the defendant declined it. The property described in the binding slip was destroyed by fire which commenced about three o'clock that afternoon. It was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, the contract of insurance having been terminated by the giving of the notice. See also Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. McKinnon, 59 Tex. 507.

Where the property is of such a nature that insurance companies would not take the risk upon it without a survey, and there is a dispute as to whether there was sufficient time for such survey and reinsurance after the notice of cancellation was given and before the time of the fire, the question of reasonable notice should be submitted to the jury. Chadbourne v. German-American Ins. Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 533.

3. Return of Unearned Premium — Necessity of. — Southern Ins. Co. v. Williams, 62 Ark. 382; Etna Ins. Co. v. Rosenberg, 62 Ark. 507; Manlove v. Commercial Mut. F. Ins. Co., 47 Kan. 309; German Ins. Co. v. Rounds, 35 Neb.

The acts of an insurance company in deciding to close up its business and notifying the plaintiffs that the company will not be liable on its policies issued to them, without returning to the plaintiffs the unearned cash premiums paid by them to secure such policies, does not operate as a cancellation. Manlove v. Commercial Mut. F. Ins. Co., 47 Kan. 309.

4. Newark F. Ins. Co. v. Sammons, 11 Ill. App. 230.

Where the Policy of a Mutual Fire-Insurance Company provided that the insurance might be terminated at the option of the company, on giving notice to that effect, and that when the assured should have paid the proportion of losses and expenses due to the company, under the provisions of the policy, at the date of such cancellation, the premium note should be surrendered, it was held that the return of the unearned premium was not a condition precedent to such cancellation. Phoenix Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bruchelsen, 50 Ohio St. 542.

5. When No Premium Has Been Paid. — Mississippi Valley Manufacturers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Bermond, 45 Ill. App. 22; Von Wein v. Scottish Union, etc., Ins. Co., 52 N. Y. Super. Ct. 490; *Stone v. conduct of the parties evidences the fact that both considered the policy to have been canceled.¹

ccc. Full Amount Returnable Must Be Tendered. — The underwriter must be certain that the whole ratable proportion is refunded. A payment of a smaller sum does not terminate the insurance² unless agreed upon by the parties.³

Issuing of Other Policies. — So a tender of part only of the premium returnable and of another policy for a lesser sum,⁴ or the issuing of other policies to the full amount of the canceled insurance,⁵ is not sufficient unless accepted by the insured.⁶

(dd) Entry on Books. — Where the charter of a mutual insurance company provides that the cancellation of any policy shall not take effect until entered on the books of the company, a resolution of the board of directors authorizing the cancellation of risks on notice to the assured, by the secretary of the company, is ineffective, and such notification to a policy holder will not terminate his insurance without such entry.⁷

cc. EFFECT OF CANCELLATION. — The effect of a cancellation is to relieve the insurer from any future liability on the policy, but it does not reach back and absolve him from any liability which he may have already incurred. If the subject-matter of the contract has already been destroyed, by the cause insured against, at the time when the cancellation is effected, the insurer is not discharged from liability thereby.⁸

(d) Cancellation by Right Reserved to Assured. — Where an insurance policy contains the stipulation that "the assured may also cancel this policy by surrendering the same at any time after the premium or premium notes have been paid, the company retaining short rates and all expenses incurred in taking

There can be no cancellation of an insurance policy unaccompanied by a return of the unearned premium. It is not sufficient for the company to say, "Your money is ready for you, subject to your order." The acts of refunding and cancellation must be simultaneous. There is no obligation resting upon the assured to apply at the place of business of the insurance company and await its pleasure. It knows when it determines to cancel a policy, and forthwith, with its determination, it should tender the unearned premium. Until this is done, there cannot be a cancellation. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Ill. 342.

1. Waiver of Tender of Premium. — The insured may waive the right to insist upon the return of the premium as a condition precedent to cancellation. Whether his acts constitute such a waiver is ordinarily a question of fact. See Hopkins v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 78 Iowa 344; Hillock v. Traders Ins. Co., 54 Mich. 531; Kirby v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 340; Lampasas Hotel, etc., Co. v. Home Ins. Co., 17 Tex. Civ. App. 615; Bingham v. Insurance Co. of North America, 74 Wis. 498.

2. Full Amount Returnable Must Be Tendered. — Where the amount of the return premium was thirty dollars and sixty-eight cents, and the sum actually refunded was only twenty-four dollars and forty-six cents, it was held that the payment of the latter sum did not terminate the insurance, although it did not appear that the assured made any objection to the amount refunded. Van Valkenburgh v. Lenox F. Ins. Co., 51 N. Y. 465.

6. Acceptance of New Policy by Insured. — An insurance policy gave to the insurance company the right to cancel the policy on five days' notice. The company exercised this privilege through a broker, who, acting for the plaintiffs on the second day after the notice, reinsured them for the same amount in another company. The policy of the first company was not surrendered by the plaintiffs, nor was there any formal cancellation of it or a return of any part of the premium. On the day following the issuing of the new policy, the property was destroyed by fire. The evidence showed that it was the intention of all parties that the second policy should be substituted for the first, and that the plaintiffs did not intend to increase their line of insurance. The second company paid its proportion of the loss. It was held that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover from the first company. Arnfeld v. Guardian Assur. Co., 172 Pa. St. 605.

the risk," the question what are the reasonable expenses incurred by the company in taking the risk is one of fact for the jury, and not of law for the court.¹

(e) Cancellation under Right Conferred by Statute. — The New York Insurance Law provides that any corporations transacting the business of fire insurance within the state shall cancel any policy of insurance at the request of the party insured.²

Requisites. — Under this statute the sole requirement to effect a cancellation is a request by the insured. It is not necessary that there should be any action on the part of the insurer. No formal cancellation or physical defacement of the policy is required. The surrender of the policy with the request that it be terminated operates to cancel it, even if the insurer absolutely refuses to permit its cancellation.³

Request to Cancel. — In order, however, to terminate the contract of insurance, the request must be made by the insured or his authorized agent to the insurer or to one having adequate authority to act in the matter in his behalf.⁴

When the Request Is Sent by Mail, until it reaches the insurer or his agent the cancellation is incomplete and the policy remains in force.⁵

(2) Rescission of Policies Tainted with Fraud — (a) When Fraud Affects Interest of Assured. — When a person has been induced to take out a policy of insurance by the false representations of the agent of the insurer, in respect to matters affecting the interest of the assured under the policy, the assured may, upon discovering the fraud, repudiate the contract and recover back the premiums paid, or set up the facts as a defense to an action on a note given therefor.⁶

Repudiation Within Reasonable Time. — The right to repudiate the contract, however, must be exercised within a reasonable time.⁷ What is a reasonable time is of course a question of fact for the jury.⁸

(b) When Fraud Affects Insurer Only. — But when the misrepresentations of the agent are of facts that are of interest to the insurer alone, and their truth or falsity can be of moment and importance to him only, it is a question whether the fraud is of such a nature as to entitle the assured to rescind the contract, and there are decisions both ways in respect to it.⁹

Thus a member of a mutual fire-insurance company cannot avoid his policy on the ground that he was induced to make the contract by fraudulent misrepresentations of the agent of the company, where he has made no objection for over a year, and has paid assessments, and in the meantime a large number of other persons have been induced to become members on the faith of his membership. Susquehanna Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Oberholtzer, 172 Pa. St. 223; Eichman v. Hersker, 170 Pa. St. 402.

8. Reasonable Time Question of Fact. — Beckwith v. Ryan, 66 Conn. 589.

The defendant gave his note for the premiums on certain life-insurance policies on June 8. On June 11 he learned that certain estimates, which were represented to be those of the company, were not theirs in fact, and on June 12 he wrote a letter of inquiry to the company. Not receiving any reply to that letter, he rescinded the contract on June 20. It was held that it was a question for the jury, under proper instructions, whether the rescission was seasonable. Norton v. Gleason, 61 Vt. 474.

9. View that Fraud Not Available to Assured as Ground for Rescission. — Mailhoit v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 87 Me. 374, 47 Am. St. Rep. 336.

Contra. — If the agent of an insurance company, without the knowledge of the assured, inserts in the application such misrepresentations as would avoid the policy if made by the assured, the assured, on discovering the fraud, may rescind the contract and show the facts as a defense in a suit by the company upon a note given for the premium. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Reed, 84 Mich. 524.

A married woman signed her husband's name, without his knowledge or consent, to

b. BY COURTS OF EQUITY. — While it is the general rule that a court of equity has not, or will not exercise, jurisdiction to cancel a contract merely because it has become void or inoperative by reason of some fact which has taken place since its execution, yet where a contract of life insurance has been declared void by the insurer on the ground of a breach of a condition in the policy, and the beneficiary refuses to surrender the policy, but annually tenders the premium due upon it to the insurer, it has been held that the circumstances render it inequitable to compel the parties to await the death of the insured to determine the validity of the policy by an action at law, and that a court of equity ought to take jurisdiction.¹

III. THE INSURER — 1. Definition. — The insurer is the underwriter or insurance company with whom the contract of insurance is made.²

2. Who May Insure. — In the absence of a prohibitory statute, any person able to make a valid contract may contract to insure another against a specified peril. Formerly a large proportion of the risks were underwritten by private individuals or common-law partnerships; but now the insurance business is carried on almost exclusively by incorporated companies,³ and in some of the United States it is confined by statute to such companies.⁴

3. Insurance Companies — a. SEVERAL KINDS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES — (1) In General. — Insurance companies may conveniently be divided into three classes: stock, mutual, and mixed.

(2) Stock Companies. — In stock companies the members or stockholders contribute a capital which is liable for the contracts of the company, and absorb the entire profits of the undertaking.⁵ The insured pay premiums which form the basis of their contract with the company.⁶

Stockholder's Interest. — A stockholder in an insurance company has the same rights that a stockholder in any other company has. He has no legal title to the property or profits of the corporation until a dividend is declared or a division is made on the dissolution of the corporation.⁷

(3) Mutual Companies. — A mutual company is one in which the members are both the insurers and the insured. The premiums paid by them constitute the fund which is liable for the losses and expenses, and they share in the profits in proportion to their interest, and control and regulate the affairs of the company.⁸ The premiums may, consistently with the principle of mutuality, in the absence of a charter provision to the contrary, be paid in cash as well as in assessable notes, or may be paid in both cash and notes.⁹

In some of the United States mutual insurance companies are defined by statute.¹

Distinction Between Stock and Mutual Companies. — There is an essential difference between stock and mutual insurance companies. The original design of mutual insurance was to provide cheap insurance by means of local associations, the members of which should insure each other. Such associations are in their nature adapted only to local business. They need many by-laws and conditions that are not required in stock companies.²

(4) Mixed Companies. — A mixed company is one that combines the characteristics of both stock and mutual companies.³

b. ORGANIZATION. — While insurance companies resemble other corporations in the manner and incidents of their organization,⁴ there are some points of difference, principally growing out of legislation passed for the protection of policy holders. Thus, in England and in most, if not all, of the United States statutes have been enacted prescribing certain conditions which must be fulfilled before an insurance company will be permitted to organize and transact business. Such legislation is enacted in pursuance of the inherent power of the state to prescribe such laws as may be essential for the good government of the community and the protection of the citizen.⁵ Some of the conditions prescribed by these statutes are, that the company shall possess a certain amount of capital before commencing business;⁶ that the capital shall be paid in, in cash or in certain prescribed securities;⁷ that the company shall deposit a certain sum with the state as security;⁸ that it shall receive Constitutionality of Statute — State Incurs No Responsibility Except as Depository. — Atty.-Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co., 82 N. Y. 172.

Deposit Held in Trust for Policy Holders. — Under the Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 3332 et seq.), requiring insurance companies to deposit securities with the insurance commissioner in trust for the benefit of the policy holders, the commissioner is merely a custodian of the securities, vested with the bare legal title in trust for the policy holders. He has no authority to transfer, surrender, or exchange the securities, without the approval of the state treasurer, in the cases and in the manner provided by section 3155; and an attempted transfer and surrender by him, except as so provided, is absolutely void. Hayne v. Metropolitan Trust Co., 67 Minn. 245.

In Michigan a substantially similar statute has received a like construction. Imperial L. Ins. Co. v. Hambitzer, 95 Mich. 513.

Trust Binds Notes Deposited by Reinsuring Company to Replace Deposit Improperly Withdrawn. — Relfe v. Columbia L. Ins. Co., 10 Mo. App. 150.

Right to Collect Income of Securities Deposited with State. — Under the Rhode Island statute (Gen. Stat. 1872, c. 143, § 18; Gen. Laws 1896, c. 181, § 18), an insurance company has not an absolute right to collect the income of securities deposited with the general treasurer of the state, but may receive such income with the permission of the treasurer. This permission the treasurer will grant or refuse as the interests of the policy holders may require. In case of refusal the income accrues to the principal of the securities, to pay first the policy holders and, second, all other creditors. Moies v. Economical Mut. L. Ins. Co., 12 R. I. 259.

1. What Application Must State. — Where by statute the organization of an insurance company is made conditional upon its receiving applications for insurance to a certain amount, it is not essential to the completion of the organization that the applications should set forth all the particulars of the risk which it is intended to insure against; it is sufficient if they state the objects on which insurance is sought, without specifying the particulars. Caryl v. McElrath, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 176.

2. Unity Ins. Co. v. Cram, 43 N. H. 636.

3. The Michigan Statute, Laws 1859, p. 1083, § 9, requiring an insurance company to file a certified copy of its articles of association with the county clerk of the county in which such company is located, was not designed in any way to affect the validity of the contracts entered into by the company, but was intended simply to facilitate the means of proving the corporate existence. Jhons v. People, 25 Mich. 409.

Statutory Requirement that Certificate of Deposit of Requisite Capital Stock Be Filed. — Under an Illinois statute, a mutual fire-insurance company cannot transact business as a corporation until it has filed with the county clerk the certificate of the auditor of public accounts that the corporators have deposited the requisite capital stock. Gent v. Manufacturers', etc., Mut. Ins. Co., 107 Ill. 652, affirming 13 Ill. App. 308.

4. People v. Flint, 64 Cal. 49.

5. Unity Ins. Co. v. Cram, 43 N. H. 636.

Right to Certificate of Authority to Do Business.

— Under the Kansas Act of 1889, c. 159, if an insurance company is solvent and has fully complied with the laws of the state, the superintendent of insurance has no power to refuse to it a certificate of authority to do business in the state. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. McNall, 81 Fed. Rep. 888; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Boyle, 82 Fed. Rep. 705.

Legislative and Judicial Recognition of Validity of Incorporation. — An act of the legislature authorizing a fire-insurance company, on certain conditions, to take marine risks is not a legislative recognition of the valid incorporation of the company; nor will the appointment of a receiver for an insurance company by the court, and the consequent partial assumption and control by the court of the affairs and funds of the company, constitute a judicial recognition of the due incorporation of the company. People v. Rensselaer Ins. Co., 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 323.

But in White v. Coventry, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 305, it was held that if there are any defects in the organization of an insurance company, they will be cured by a subsequent act of the legislature which treats it as an existing corporation and changes its name.

Estoppel to Deny Corporate Existence. — Where an insurance company has attempted to increase its capital and has filed papers for that purpose, received subscriptions for and sold stock under such increase, and incurred liabilities upon policies of insurance bearing upon their face evidence of such increase, this is sufficient to constitute the company a corporation de facto, so that neither it nor its stockholders can object that it is not a corporation de jure. Upton v. Hansbrough, 3 Biss. (U. S.) 417. See also Trumbull County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Horner, 17 Ohio 407; and the title DE FACTO CORPORATIONS, vol. 8, p. 769.

Statutes Applying to Individuals, Partnerships, and Unincorporated Associations. — Some of the statutes requiring the fulfilment of certain conditions as a prerequisite to the right to engage in the insurance business apply to individuals, partnerships, and unincorporated associations, as well as to incorporated companies.¹

Registration — England. — In England an insurance company consisting of more than twenty persons which fails to register as required by the statute of 1862² is incapable of suing either at law or in equity, and cannot even present a petition for its own winding up.³

Limitation upon Character of Business. — A company which proposes to carry on any other business than that of insurance cannot be incorporated under a statute providing for the incorporation of insurance companies.⁴

Vacation of Charter for Noncompliance with Its Conditions. — By statute in some jurisdictions, if an insurance company does not comply with the fundamental requisites of its charter or the act under which it is incorporated, it is liable to an action for the purpose of vacating its charter or annulling its corporate existence.⁵

c. CONSOLIDATION AND AMALGAMATION — (1) Consolidation. — By statute authority may be given to two or more insurance companies to consolidate.

contracted with an insurance company as such are estopped from afterwards denying that the company was legally incorporated. White v. Coventry, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 305. But compare Lagrone v. Timmerman, 46 S. Car. 372. See generally on this subject the title DE FACTO CORPORATIONS, vol. 8, p. 760.

Injunction to Restrain Company from Doing Business Without Authority. — An insurance company legally authorized to do business in a state is not entitled to an injunction to restrain another company from doing business without authority, unless the acts of the latter company had actually caused some special injury, or would necessarily cause such injury, to the former company's business. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Employers' Liability Ins. Co., 78 Hun (N. Y.) 446, affirming 61 Hun (N. Y.) 552.

1. Individuals, Partnerships, and Unincorporated Associations — Certain Capital Required. — The requirement of a certain capital under the New York statutes applies to individuals, etc., as well as to corporations. People v. Loew, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 23 Misc. (N. Y.) 574.

Contra, under the Alabama statute. Hoadley v. Purifoy, 107 Ala. 276.

A certificate from the superintendent of the insurance department showing compliance with the laws as to insurance must be obtained by individuals or associations as well as by companies. State v. Stone, 118 Mo. 388, 40 Am. St. Rep. 388. Compare Fort v. State, 92 Ga. 8.

Injunction to Restrain Use of Registered Name. — A company which is registered under the Companies Act of 1862 is entitled to an injunction to restrain another company from using its registered name. Accident Ins. Co. v. Accident, etc., Ins. Corp., 54 L. J. Ch. 104, 51 L. T. N. S. 597.

4. Can Carry On No Other Business. — Thus a company which proposes to carry on as part of an insurance business "the inspection and certification as to the sanitary conditions of buildings and premises" cannot be incorporated under a statute providing for the incorporation of insurance companies. People v. Rosendale, 142 N. Y. 126, affirming 76 Hun (N. Y.) 103, reversing 5 Misc. (N. Y.) 378.

5. People v. Rensselaer Ins. Co., 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 323.

Unauthorized Revocation of License — Company Doing Business Without Authority Not Entitled to Relief. — Where an insurance company attempts to do business without complying with the requisites of a statute which forbids such companies doing business without complying with such requisites, it cannot obtain relief against the insurance commissioner for revoking its license, although such commissioner has no justification to revoke it. National L. Ins. Co. v. State Com'rs, 25 Mich. 321.

But a statute authorizing such consolidation cannot affect or impair the rights of parties under subsisting contracts with the companies proposing to consolidate, nor, without their consent, transfer such contracts to the new organization; and to the extent that the statute attempts this, it will be void.¹

Right to Issue Joint Policies. — In the absence of a statute authorizing them to do so, insurance companies cannot combine in issuing joint policies of insurance, unless such policies particularly specify the amount or proportion of premium received by each company, and also ascertain and definitely fix the amount of liability assumed by each, and further provide that each acts for itself and not for the other. Where these conditions are observed, the companies may adopt a name and designate the kind of policy issued.²

(2) Amalgamation — (a) Amalgamation Defined — Right to Amalgamate. — In England the transaction by which one insurance company absorbs another is called amalgamation. This is usually accomplished by the purchase of one company of the good will and the whole concern of the other. Such a purchase, not being one of the objects for which an insurance company is ordinarily incorporated, is ultra vires unless expressly authorized by its deed of settlement or by the statute under which the company was organized or registered.³ When authorized, such purchase must be made in strict conformity to the authority given.⁴

(b) Rights of Policy Holders in Amalgamated Company — When Required to Accept Substituted Liability. — When companies legally authorized to do so amalgamate, the holders of the policies in the amalgamated company are not bound to accept, in lieu of the liability of that company, the responsibility of the amalgamating company, unless the deed of settlement or other instrument constituting the former company, or the policies issued by it, or both construed together, require the policy holders to accept any subsequently substituted liability created by an intra vires amalgamation.⁵

The deed of association of an insurance company, which bound the policy holders, contained a power to dissolve, and thereupon the directors were to get from another company an undertaking to pay all future liabilities, and to transfer to such company so much of the funds as should be agreed on between the contracting parties as sufficient to enable the latter company to comply with its undertak-

Accepting Substituted Liability. — Of course the contract of amalgamation may provide that a policy holder shall not be required to accept the substituted liability without his consent.¹ Where the consent of a policy holder is essential to a substitution of responsibility, the question whether such consent has been given and the responsibility of the amalgamating company accepted is one of fact.² Strict proof of such acceptance will always be required.³

If a Policy Holder in the Amalgamated Company Is Also a Shareholder in That Company, and the amalgamation is sanctioned at a meeting of the shareholders, such policy holder is bound by the amalgamation, and has no claim against the amalgamated company on his policy.⁴

Acceptance of Amalgamating Company's Indorsement. — An acceptance by a policy holder in the amalgamated company of an indorsement on his policy by the amalgamating company, charging the assets of the company with the payment of the policy, constitutes an acceptance of the liability of the latter company in lieu of, and not as surety for, the former company.⁵

Payment of Premiums to Amalgamating Company. — The acceptance of the substituted liability need not necessarily be express. Paying premiums to the amalgamating company and taking receipts therefor for a number of years, with full knowledge of the facts, will constitute an acceptance;⁶ not, however, where such payments are made subject to a formal written protest.⁷

Receipt of Annuity for Amalgamating Company. — The mere receipt by an annuitant in the amalgamated company of payments in respect of his annuity from the amalgamating company will not constitute an acceptance of the liability of the latter company.⁸

Acceptance Must Be with Full Knowledge of Facts. — An acceptance by a policy

ing. It was held that the amount to be paid over was a matter of agreement between the two companies, with which the policy holders had no concern, and that a policy holder who refused to be transferred had no claim upon the amalgamated company. Re Waterloo L., etc., Assur. Co., 33 Beav. 542.

holder of the substituted responsibility, to be binding upon him, must be with full knowledge of all the facts.¹

d. REGULATION — (1) Power of State to Regulate — (a) Police Power. — The charter of an insurance company is a contract which the state, under the constitutional inhibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, is bound to respect; but in every such charter there is an implied condition that the corporation shall be subject to such reasonable regulations in respect to the general conduct of its affairs as the legislature, acting within the constitutional limitations, may from time to time prescribe, if they do not materially interfere with or obstruct the substantial enjoyment of the privileges which the state has granted, and serve only to secure the ends for which the corporation was created. The power to prescribe such regulations is inherent in every sovereignty, and cannot be surrendered.²

(b) Power Reserved in Constitution. — But apart from the police power inherent in the state, the power to regulate insurance companies is reserved in the constitutions of some of the United States. Thus, under a constitutional provision reserving to the legislature the power to alter, revoke, or annul any charter of incorporation, the legislature may change or modify the charter of an insurance company by requiring the company to conform to regulations enacted for the protection of the public and those doing business with the company.³

(2) Regulations Prescribed in Exercise of Power. — In pursuance of the power to regulate insurance companies, statutes have been enacted in England and in perhaps all of the United States. The regulations prescribed by these statutes are numerous and varied, and many of them have received the interpretation of the courts. Some of the requirements of the statutes are that no insurance company shall use a name or title which at the time of its organization is used to designate some other insurance company;⁴ that the officers of insurance companies shall give bonds to the state for the faithful performance

In 1862 the business and assets of the Manchester Association were transferred to the Western Society, which was afterwards incorporated with the Albert Company. A policy holder in the Manchester Association paid his premiums at the different offices and took receipts, which mentioned the successive changes, the last receipts being in the name of the Albert Company alone. It was held that the receipts did not disclose enough to fix the policy holder with knowledge of what had taken place between the companies, and that his executors were entitled to obtain a winding-up order against the Manchester Association. *In re Manchester, etc., L. A statute requiring insurance companies annually or on demand to furnish to the state superintendent of insurance or other proper officer a statement of their conditions does not impair the obligation of the contract arising from a charter between the state and a company chartered previous to the passage of the act, and therefore is not unconstitutional. Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574; State v. Mathews, 44 Mo. 523; State v. Eagle Ins. Co., 50 Ohio St. 252; Com. v. Hock Age Mut. Beneficial Assoc., 10 Phila. (Pa.) 554, 31 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 245.

4. Same Name Not to Be Used. — The New York statute to this effect has been held not to prohibit a life-insurance company from using a name previously used by a fire-insurance company. Commercial Union Assur. Co. v. Smith, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 2 N. Y. Supp. 296.

of their duties; ¹ that the policies or contracts of insurance shall be subscribed and countersigned by certain specified officers; ² that such policies shall state certain facts and contain certain conditions; ³ that companies shall not discriminate in rates of insurance between insurers of the same class; ⁴ that they shall not loan on a policy more than the reserve value thereof; ⁵ that they shall not cancel any policy unless they comply with the provisions of the statute relating thereto; ⁶ that companies of a certain class shall not insure against certain specified perils or shall insure against them only on certain conditions; ⁷ that existing companies shall not do business after a certain date unless in possession of a certain amount of capital; ⁸ that companies shall create and maintain reserve funds; ⁹ that investments and loans shall be made only on the pledge of securities of a certain character; ¹⁰ that companies shall annually, semiannually, or on demand furnish to the superintendent of insurance or other proper officer statements of their condition; ¹¹ and that there shall be an examination into the affairs of companies doing business in the state. ¹²

1. Bonds from Officers Required. — Kaw L. Assoc. v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 661.

2. Evidence Constituting Prima Facie Proof of Appointment of Officers. — Under a statute requiring the policies issued by an insurance company shall be subscribed by the president and countersigned by the secretary, evidence that the persons so subscribing and countersigning a policy have acted as president and secretary is prima facie proof of their appointment. Dimock v. New Brunswick Marine Assur. Co., 6 N. Bruns. 398. See also Robertson v. Provincial Mut., etc., Ins. Co., 8 N. Bruns. 379.

3. Statements and Conditions in Policies. — Citizens Ins. Co. v. Parsons, 7 App. Cas. 96, affirming 4 Can. Sup. Ct. 215; National L. Ins. Co. v. State Commissioner, 25 Mich. 321.

Power to Regulate Insurance Contracts in Canada. — In Canada, under the British North America Act, 1867, §§ 91, 92, the power to regulate the contracts of insurance companies in a particular province is in the provincial legislature. Such a regulation is not a "regulation of trade and commerce" within the meaning of section 91, subsec. 2, of the act. Therefore the Ontario Act, 39 Vict., c. 24, dealing with policies of insurance entered into or in force in the province of Ontario for insuring property situated therein against fire, and prescribing certain conditions which are to form part of such contracts, is a valid act. Such act is not inconsistent with the Dominion Act, 38 Vict., c. 20, which requires all insurance companies, whether incorporated by foreign, dominion, or provincial authority, to obtain a license, to be granted only upon compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act. Citizens' Ins. Co. v. Parsons, 7 App. Cas. 96, affirming 4 Can. Sup. Ct. 215; Goring v. London Mut. F. Ins. Co., 11 Ont. 82. See also the title DOMINION OF CANADA, vol. 10, p. 82.

4. Discrimination Forbidden. — People v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 72 Ill. App. 560.

5. Loan in Violation of Statute Void. — A loan in violation of a statute prohibiting insurance companies from loaning on policies more than the reserve value of such policies is void. Such a loan, therefore, will constitute no defense to an action on a policy. Hoover v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co., 6 Ohio Dec. 432.

6. Regulation of Cancellation. — Morrow v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 29 Ont. 377.

7. Specified Risks Forbidden. — Under the Wisconsin statutes, Laws of 1872, c. 103, § 10, and Stat. Wis., § 1931, which prohibit insurance companies of a certain class from insuring schoolhouses without a majority vote of the members, a policy issued by such a company upon a dwelling afterwards converted into a schoolhouse was held to be void. The term "schoolhouse" is used in this statute to designate a house or building in which a school is kept, and is not restricted in its application to a district school. Luthe v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 55 Wis. 543.

8. Requirement as to Capital for Future Business of Existing Companies. — Such a requirement does not inhibit a company not in possession of the required amount of capital from indemnifying itself by reinsurance for the risks already assumed. Davenport F. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 50 Iowa 619.

9. Reserve Fund. — Nicholson v. Nicholson, 30 L. J. Ch. 617, 9 W. R. 676.

10. Land Mortgaged to Be Unencumbered. — The requirement of the New York statute that mortgages taken by insurance companies shall be upon "unencumbered" property does not avoid a mortgage to such a company of property previously encumbered. A disregard of the provisions of the statute is a matter of which cognizance can be taken by the state alone. Washington L. Ins. Co. v. Clason, 16 N. Y. App. Div. 434.

11. Statement of Condition of Companies Required. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574; State v. Mathews, 44 Mo. 523; Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co., 5 Mo. 12. Examination into Affairs of Companies. — Fry v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 197; Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574; State Invest., etc., Co. v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 135; Palache v. Pacific Ins. Co., 42 Cal. 419; Stedman v. American Mut. L.

Penal Statutes. — Some of these statutes prescribe a penalty for a violation of their provisions.¹ Such statutes must be strictly construed, and every fact necessary to constitute the offense for which the recovery of the penalty is sought must be clearly proven. No intendments will be allowed in favor of the party for whose benefit the suit is brought.²

e. TAXATION — (1) State. — The property and business of insurance companies are liable to taxation by the state unless exempted therefrom by the charter of the company or by constitutional provision.³ By the words "persons"⁴ or "associations"⁵ insurance companies are included in the provisions of tax laws which do not in their text indicate the contrary intent. But in many jurisdictions there are statutes relating exclusively to the taxation of insurance companies. Some of the provisions of statutes under which the property or business of insurance companies are taxed have received the interpretation of the courts.⁶

(2) Municipal. — The power of the state to tax the property and business of insurance companies may be delegated by the state to municipal corpora-

A Michigan Statute (Laws 1869, Act No. 136) providing for the organization of insurance companies required existing companies, within a certain time, to make their organization conform to the provisions of the act, and further provided for an examination into the affairs of insurance companies by persons appointed for that purpose. Under this act it was held that existing companies might be required to submit to the examination authorized by the act before the expiration of the time within which they were required to conform their organization to the provisions of the act. People v. State Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 392.

1. Statutes Penalizing Violation of Regulations. — People v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 72 Ill. App. 569; People v. State Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 392; Piedmont, etc., L. Ins. Co. v. Ray, 50 Tex. 511.

2. Penal Statutes Strictly Construed. — People v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 72 Ill. App. 569. In this case it was held that there could be no recovery under the Illinois statute (Act of June 19, 1891) penalizing a discrimination in rates of insurance between insurers of the same class, unless there had been an actual insurance and delivery of the discriminating policy. A sale of such a policy and an offer to deliver it were held not sufficient to constitute the offense.

In Fisher v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co., (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 363, it was held that an action against an insurance company to recover the penalty prescribed by the New York Act of 1853, § 18, for making a false annual statement, could be brought only by the district attorney in the name of the people; a stockholder could not bring such an action.

6. A Statute Taxing the Capital of Moneyed or Stock Corporations has been held to render taxable a fund possessed by an insurance company arising from premiums earned upon policies invested so as to yield an income to be divided among the members, which fund could not, according to the charter, be withdrawn and divided among the members. The company had no other capital or effects. It was held, however, that surplus earnings or profits over and above the amount retained as permanent capital were not taxable under the statute. Mutual Ins. Co. v. Erie County, 4 N. Y. 442; Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. New York, 8 N. Y. 241, affirming 5 Sandf. (N. Y.) 10, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 450. See also People v. New York, 16 N. Y. 424, affirming 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 81.

Deposit to Secure Policy Holders Not Taxable as Net Profit. — Peters v. St. John, 21 Can. Sup. Ct. 674.

Stamp Act Distinguished from License Act — Direct Taxation. — An act purporting to be an act licensing insurance companies, by which such a company is not compelled either to take out or to pay for a license, but which merely provides that the price of the license shall consist of a stamp to be affixed to policies of insurance renewals and receipts, is not a license act. The tax imposed by such a statute is not a direct tax, and therefore is not warranted by a constitutional provision authorizing direct taxation. Atty.-Gen. v. Queen Ins. Co., 3 App. Cas. 1090; David v. Stadacona Ins. Co., 3 Montreal Leg. N. 118.

An Insurance Agent Is Not Personally Liable for the License exacted by law of persons, firms, or corporations who do an insurance business. State v. Woods, 40 La. Ann. 175.

tions, and in many jurisdictions the power to assess and collect such taxes upon companies doing business within their limits has been granted to municipalities. Some of the provisions of these statutes and of municipal ordinances enacted in pursuance to the power have been construed by the courts.¹

(3) Property Liable to Taxation — Unearned Premiums. — The idea of the difference between earned and unearned premiums, as affecting the question of present property, is too uncertain to form a basis for taxation. It is a matter of nice calculation and adjustment, beyond the reach of assessing officers, and within the exclusive knowledge of the corporation. So a tax on the property of insurance companies² or on the accumulated surplus of such companies³ applies to unearned as well as to earned premiums, and this notwithstanding a statute prohibiting the payment of dividends from unearned premiums.⁴

Taxation of Capital and Surplus at Its Actual Value. — But where by statute it is provided that the capital stock and surplus profit of a company shall be taxed "at its actual value," it has been held that the contingent liability of a company upon outstanding policies in force should be deducted from the full amount of the capital and surplus in determining the value thereof for taxation under the statute.⁵

(4) Exemptions — (a) In General. — In many jurisdictions there are statutes exempting from taxation the property, or certain kinds of property, belonging to insurance companies. Some of these statutes exempt such property from all taxation, some from state and others from municipal taxation.

(b) Exemptions Strictly Construed. — Such statutes are generally strictly construed. The exemption must be described in clear and unambiguous language, and must appear to be indisputably within the intention of the legislature.⁶

(c) Exemption of Bona Fide Debts. — It is quite usual for statutes to provide for the deduction of bona fide debts in assessing property for taxation. A bona fide debt, within the meaning of such a provision, is a fixed liability to pay a sum certain, due or to become due at all events. The uncertain liability of an insurance company to indemnify for a loss that may never occur is not

1. Statute Authorising License Tax. — Under a statute authorizing a municipal corporation to "license, tax, and regulate" insurance companies, the corporation may require such companies to pay a license tax, though a tax on their net income is also imposed. St. Joseph v. Ernst, 95 Mo. 360.

3. The liability to losses upon policies issued and unexpired is a contingent, not a fixed, liability, and therefore does not affect the character of the fund arising from the premiums as surplus capital or accumulated surplus. State v. Parker, 35 N. J. L. 575. As to accumulated surplus, see ACCUMULATED SURPLUS (OF A CORPORATION), vol. I, p. 481.

5. Capital and Surplus to Be Taxed at Actual Value. — People v. Ferguson, 38 N. Y. 89. See also People v. Tax Com'rs, 76 N. Y. 64.

6. Exemptions in general words from assessment and taxation have been held to apply to exemptions from state taxation only, and not to affect the right of municipal authorities to tax for local purposes. People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, affirming 25 Hun (N. Y.) 630. See also Columbus v. Hartford Ins. Co., 25 Neb. 83.

A provision in the charter of an insurance company requiring it to pay into the state treasury a certain percentage upon its capital stock does not exempt such company from further taxation in the absence of a provision in the charter showing an intention so to exempt it. Kenton Ins. Co. v. Covington, 86 Ky. 213.

Exemption Held Constitutional. — A provision in the charter of an insurance company establishing a fixed bonus in commutation of all taxes on its capital stock and property does not violate a constitutional provision interdicting all "exclusive separate public emoluments or privileges but in consideration of public services." Daughdrill v. Alabama L. Ins., etc., Co., 31 Ala. 91.

such a debt, and unearned premiums are not exempt from taxation under such a provision.¹ Nor is the reserve fund of a company exempt.²

f. POWERS — (1) In General. — Insurance companies, like other private corporations, have those powers, and only those, which they have derived by grant from the state, including the powers expressly granted and such incidental powers as are necessary to carry into effect those specifically conferred.³ They cannot engage in any transaction or business not calculated to advance the purposes for which they were incorporated,⁴ nor can their powers be enlarged by any act of the corporate body.⁵

Particular Powers Construed. — Some of the particular provisions of charters conferring powers upon insurance companies have received the interpretation of the courts.⁶

1. Unearned Premiums Not Exempt as Bona Fide Debts. — Kenton Ins. Co. v. Covington, 86 Ky. 113; People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, affirming 25 Hun (N. Y.) 630; Amazon Ins. Co. v. Cappellar, 38 Ohio St. 560.

Ontario — Interest on Reserve Fund. — In Ontario it was held that where an insurance company is not bound to add the interest earned on its statutory reserve fund to the fund itself, but is free to do therewith as it pleases, such interest is part of its assessable income. The court did not decide whether the reserve fund itself was exempted from assessment on account of its being held to answer liability to holders of policies, a ruling on this question not being necessary to the decision of the case. Confederation L. Assoc. v. Toronto, 22 Ont. App. 166, affirming 24 Ont. 643.

An Insurance Company Possesses No Powers Before Organization, and cannot enter into any kind of contract or transact any business whatever. Nor have the corporators bringing it into being any power to bind it by contract, unless so authorized by the charter. Gent v. Manufacturers, etc., Mut. Ins. Co., 107 Ill. 652, affirming 13 Ill. 6. Under a Charter Authorising an Insurance Company to Grant Annuities, and providing that "it shall and may be lawful" for the company to set apart a fund to be held and pledged for payment of annuities, the company has power to grant annuities before setting apart the fund. Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 84.

Under an Authority to Declare Dividends from Profits, an insurance company is not justified in treating as profits subject to be divided premiums received upon unexpired risks, when it has not independent thereof a fund sufficient to meet all liabilities that may accrue on the pending risks. Lexington L., etc., Ins. Co. v. Page, 17 B. Mon. (Ky.) 412, 66 Am. Dec. 165; Scott v. Eagle F. Co., 7 Paige (N. Y.) 198; De Peyster v. American F. Ins. Co., 6 Paige (N. Y.) 486. (2) Power to Amend or Repeal Charter. — Power to amend or repeal its charter or deed of settlement is sometimes conferred upon an insurance company. Such a power will authorize a company whose deed of settlement contains no authority to sell or transfer its business to alter such deed so as to acquire that authority.¹

(3) Power to Make By-laws. — The power to make by-laws is incident to a grant of corporate power. Unless an insurance company's charter or a statute² specifically delegates this power to the board of directors or other integral part of the corporate body, it will be deemed to be vested in the corporation as a whole and can be exercised only by the members of the corporation.³ The provisions of a by-law must not conflict with any of the terms of the charter.⁴

Validity of By-laws. — A by-law of an insurance company which consists of several distinct and independent parts may be valid as to one of those parts though void as to the others.⁵ A by-law limiting the time within which an action for a loss may be instituted by a policy holder is valid.⁶ But a by-law requiring that any suit on a policy shall be brought in the county where the company is established is invalid.⁷

Disregard of By-law Not Sufficient to Show Its Repeal. — The mere fact that the officers of an insurance company have disregarded a by-law of the company is not sufficient to show its repeal.⁸

Amendment Abrogating Provision as to Surrender of Policies. — Where the charter of an insurance company confers upon those making a contract of insurance with the company the right to surrender their policies on certain terms, and also authorizes the company to amend the charter, the company may amend the charter so as to abrogate the provision as to the surrender of policies, and such amendment will be binding upon the policy holders. Allen v. Life Assoc. of America, 8 Mo. App. 52.

Where the Charter of a Mutual Insurance Company, under which every member became the insurer of every other member, authorized the company to alter and amend its regulations, and on application to the legislature the charter was so changed that country members were to be alone liable for losses in the country, and vice versa, it was held that the amended charter was binding upon one who had become a member under the original charter. Currie v. Mutual Assur. Soc., 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 315.

2. Right of Directors to Make By-laws under Authority of Statute. — Though the articles of

8. Disregard by Officers Not Sufficient to Show Repeal of By-law. — Houdeck v. Merchants, etc., Ins. Co., 102 Iowa 303.

(4) Power to Contract — (a) In General. — Unless restricted by its charter, an insurance company has the incidental power to make any contract and evidence it by any instrument that may be necessary and proper to accomplish the purposes and objects for which it was incorporated,¹ but it has no implied power to contract for any other purpose;² and when the charter prescribes a mode of contracting, the company must observe that mode, and cannot contract in any other.³

Contracts Prima Facie Valid. — But a contract made by an insurance company is prima facie within its corporate power, and the burden to show that it was unauthorized is upon the person denying the power of the corporation to make it.⁴

A Company May Make Contracts through Authorized Officers and Agents, and contracts made by them within the scope of their authority will bind the company.⁵

(b) Power to Borrow Money and Procure Sureties. — An insurance company may, for the purposes of its business, borrow money,⁶ contract for a loan,⁷ or procure sureties.⁸ But it cannot, under a pretense of borrowing money, provide a Charter Requiring that Policies Be Formally Executed. — A charter of an insurance company which requires that contracts on policies of insurance be executed in a certain form and be signed and attested by certain officers has reference only to executed contracts or policies of insurance, and does not require that the initial or preliminary arrangements for insurance which precede the execution of the formal instrument by the officers of the company shall conform to its provisions. Franklin Ins. Co. v. Colt, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 560; Constant v. Allegheny Ins. Co., 3 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 313; Security F. Ins. Co. v. Kentucky M. & F. Ins. Co., 7 Bush (Ky.) 81, 3 Am. Rep. 301; Dayton Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 24 Ohio St. 345, 15 Am. Rep. 612.

5. Contracts by Officers or Agents. — Farmers, etc., Ins. Co. v. Chesnut, 50 Ill. 111, 99 Am. Dec. 492; Merchants', etc., Ins. Co. v. Curran, 45 Mo. 142, 100 Am. Dec. 361. See generally the title OFFICERS AND AGENTS OF PRIVATE CORPORATIONS.

Waiver by Secretary of Terms to Policy. — Where the by-laws of an insurance company provided that there should be no waiver of the terms or conditions of a policy "without the concurrence of the secretary of the company indorsed thereon or otherwise specifically acknowledged by him," it was held that the signing by the secretary with knowledge of the facts, of orders for payment on the adjustment of the loss, was a conclusive waiver in writing. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Gargett, 42 Mich. 289.

The Trustees of an Insurance Company under the particular provisions of its charter and by-laws, were held not to have authority to enter into a contract with the retiring president to pay a certain sum to him annually during his life, in recognition of past services and of his future usefulness to the company. Beers v. New York L. Ins. Co., 66 Hun (N. Y.) 75.

6. Company May Borrow Money for Purposes of Its Business. — Trenton Mut. L., etc., Ins. Co. v. McKelway, 12 N. J. Eq. 133; Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Perkins, 38 N. Y. 404, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 383, affirming 4 Robt. (N. Y.) 182. See generally the title CORPORATIONS (PRIVATE), vol. 7, p. 771.

Thus a company may borrow money to pay losses, Trenton Mut. L., etc., Ins. Co. v. McKelway, 12 N. J. Eq. 133; Furniss v. Gilchrist, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 53; and it may borrow a note upon which to raise money for that purpose, Furniss v. Gilchrist, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 53.

7. Company May Contract for Loan. — Trenton Mut. L., etc., Ins. Co. v. McKelway, 12 N. J. Eq. 133.

8. Power to Procure Sureties. — Hope Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Perkins, 38 N. Y. 404, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 383, affirming 4 Robt. (N. Y.) 182. In this case a note was given by the makers and received by the insurance company for the purpose of creating a guaranty fund for the prompt payment of losses in the absence of other means of the company for that purpose. It was held that the company, as incidental to capital or fund for the purpose of giving to the company a credit and character which are entirely foreign to its charter.¹

(c) Power to Make Loans and Investments. — An insurance company has, as incidental to the purposes of its incorporation, the power to loan or invest its surplus funds or profits.² But where it is authorized to loan money in a particular mode, all other modes are necessarily excluded, and all securities other than those allowed to be taken are void.³

Company Cannot Take Stock in nor Advance Money to Other Corporations. — But though an insurance company has this incidental right to make loans and investments, it has been held that, in the absence of express authority in its charter, it has no power to invest in the capital stock of, or to advance its moneys or obligations to sustain, another corporation engaged in a similar or dissimilar business.⁴

Construction of Particular Powers. — Some of the particular provisions of charters authorizing loans and investments have received the interpretation of the courts.⁵

its general powers, had the right to receive the note. It was further held that the inducement held out to the public by reason of the security offered by the note was a sufficient consideration to support it.

Where notes are delivered to special trustees of an insurance company, under an agreement so to deliver them, to be used for the benefit of the company, a transfer of the notes made by the trustees to third persons in exchange for their notes, which are discounted and the proceeds used by the company, is within the power of the corporation, and conveys a good title to the notes. Holbrook v. Basset, 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 147.

Right to Require Borrower to Insure. — An insurance company may loan its surplus funds, and may lawfully require the borrower to effect an insurance with the company at the usual terms and to pay the premiums thereon in addition to interest at the legal rate. Utica Ins. Co. v. Cadwell, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 296; New York F. Ins. Co. v. Donaldson, 3 Edw. (N. Y.) 199.

3. Authority to Loan in Particular Mode Excludes All Others. — North River Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 482; New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 678.

So an insurance company authorized to loan money on bond and mortgage cannot loan money on a note. North River Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 482.

4. Company Cannot Invest in Stock of nor Make Loans to Other Corporations. — Mechanics, etc., Mut. Sav. Bank, etc., Assoc. v. Meriden Agency Co., 24 Conn. 159; Twiss v. Guaranty L. Assoc., 87 Iowa 733, 43 Am. St. Rep. 418; Berry v. Yates, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 199.

It has been held that an insurance company has no power to subscribe to the stock of a savings bank and building association. Mechanics, etc., Mut. Sav. Bank, etc., Assoc. v. Meriden Agency Co., 24 Conn. 159.

Statutory Power Construed. — An insurance company has not authority to subscribe for and invest its capital stock in the capital stock of another corporation, under a statutory power to invest its money "in real or personal property, stocks, or choses in action." Commercial F. Ins. Co. v. Board of Revenue, 99 Ala. 1, 42 Am. St. Rep. 17.

5. Power to Invest in Bond and Mortgage. — An insurance company which has the power to invest on bond and mortgage, having taken an absolute assignment of a mortgage, may purchase a claim against the mortgagor and have it paid out of the surplus money arising from a sale of the mortgaged premises after paying the mortgage debt, the purchase of the claim being considered as an investment on bond and mortgage. Beekman F. Ins. Co. v. First M. E. Church, 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 658.

An authority to invest its funds in bonds and mortgages does not authorize an insurance company to lend its credit by giving its bond payable in the future in exchange for the bond and mortgage of an individual. Such a transaction is void. Smith v. Alabama L. Ins., etc., Co., 4 Ala. 558.

Under a statute authorizing an insurance company to invest its "capital and * * * funds * * * in bonds and mortgages," Kansas Ins. Co. v. Craft, 18 Kan. 283, or to invest its capital and funds "in such a way as the directors may deem best for the safety of the capital and interest of the stockholders," Straus v. Eagle Ins. Co., 5 Ohio St. 59, a company had no power to purchase upon credit a mortgage or other obligation of one insured by it and entitled to indemnity for a loss, for the purpose of setting off such obligation against the policy.

Where a Power to Invest in Any Stock or Fund or Debt Created under Any Federal or State Statute was contained in the charter it was held that the company was not confined to investments in the funded debts of the federal and state governments, but might invest in the stock of the United States Bank and in the stock of the banks or moneyed corporations of any particular state. Verplanck v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 84.

As to the power of insurance companies to loan money and make investments under the

(d) Power to Give and Take Notes and Other Securities. — An insurance company which is not prohibited by law from doing so may make a valid promissory note for a debt contracted in the course of its legitimate business,¹ although not expressly authorized by its charter to make notes.² It also has the power to take negotiable notes and other securities³ and to deal in exchange⁴ so far as necessary to carry on the business of insurance, but it has not the power to deal in exchange for any other purpose.⁵

(e) No Power to Engage in Banking Business. — Unless expressly authorized by its charter to do so, an insurance company cannot engage in the banking business,⁶ and in some jurisdictions such companies are expressly prohibited by statute from engaging in that business.⁷

(5) Character of Business in Which Insurance Companies May Engage. — An insurance company cannot engage in the insurance business on any other plan than that authorized by its charter or the statute under which it is incorporated;⁸ nor can it insure against any loss against which its charter does not authorize it to insure.⁹

peculiar provisions of particular charters or statutes, see also Athenæum L. Assur. Soc. v. Pooley, 3 De G. & J. 294, 28 L. J. Ch. 119, 5 Jur. N. S. 129, 7 W. R. 167; St. Joseph F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hauck, 63 Mo. 112.

Note by President of Company. — A note by which J. F., as president of an insurance company, promises to pay a certain sum, is not the note of the company, but of the maker alone. Barker v. Mechanic F. Ins. Co., 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 94, 20 Am. Dec. 664.

An Insurance Company under Authority to Draw Bills for the purposes of the company cannot draw them for any other purpose. Balfour v. Ernest, 5 C. B. N. S. 601, 94 E. C. L. 601.

3. Power to Take Notes and Other Securities. — Alexander v. Horner, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 634. See also the title CORPORATIONS (PRIVATE), vol. 7, p. 728.

Under an authority in its charter to "receive notes for premiums in advance of persons to receive its policies" and to "negotiate such notes for the purpose of paying claims or otherwise, in the course of business," an insurance company may transfer a note so received as collateral security for the payment of a debt. Brookman v. Metcalf, 32 N. Y. 591, affirming 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 429.

The purchase by an insurance company of a bill of exchange to which one of its stockholders is a party, without the assent of such stockholder, with the purpose of subjecting his stock to the payment of the bill, is ultra vires and void. White's Bank v. Toledo F. & M. Ins. Co., 12 Ohio St. 601.

What Is Banking Business. — The investment of the profits of insurance companies in loans secured by mortgage cannot be considered as banking business. Life Assoc. of America v. Levy, 33 La. Ann. 1203.

A single act of loaning money on bank discount of a promissory note, followed by several successive renewals of the note on the same discount, is not sufficient evidence to show that an insurance company has violated a statute prohibiting such companies from engaging in the banking business. New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 664; New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 678.

To receive money on deposit is no violation of the charter of an insurance company which contains a clause prohibiting the exercise of banking powers. Corwin v. Urbana, etc., Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Ohio 6.

(6) Power to Insure Property in Foreign State. — An insurance company, unless restricted by its charter, may insure a resident of a foreign state against loss of property situated in such foreign state.¹

(7) When Defense of Ultra Vires Will Avail. — The doctrine of the ultra vires contracts of corporations will be discussed elsewhere in this work.² The views of the courts on this subject are too conflicting to admit a statement of results here. Some decisions, however, may be indicated.³

g. DISSOLUTION AND FORFEITURE OF CHARTER — (1) Voluntary Dissolution. — In some of the United States there are statutes providing for the voluntary dissolution of corporations by petition to the proper court of the members, stockholders, or trustees.⁴ The provisions of some of these statutes as applied to insurance companies have received the interpretation of the courts.⁵

(2) Involuntary Dissolution and Forfeiture of Charter — (a) At Common Law. — At common law, a misuser by a corporation of its franchises is a cause of forfeiture;⁶ and for an insurance company to accept premiums for insurance without any probability of its ever being able to pay its losses is such an abuse of its franchises as affords good cause of forfeiture.⁷

1. Western v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co., 12 N. Y. 258.

Restricting Statute Construed. — A statute prohibiting insurance companies from issuing policies on property "out of the limits of the territory" where they are authorized to do business is not violated by a company's issuing policies on property within such territory, but without restriction as to the place of loss. Eddy v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. App. Div. 109, affirming 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 297.

2. See the title ULTRA VIRES.

3. Defense of Ultra Vires. — The older cases were inclined to consider the ultra vires character of the act as a complete defense in actions growing therefrom. See Smith v. Alabama L. Ins., etc., Co., 4 Ala. 558.

Ultra Vires No Defense. — Where an insurance company purchased the assets of another company, among which was a promissory note which was indorsed by the selling to the purchasing company, it was held, in an action by the purchasing company against the maker of the note, that the validity of the note being admitted, the fact that the agreement between the companies was unauthorized by their charters was not a good defense to the action. Ehrman v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co., 35 Ohio St. 324, but see the dissenting opinion of Okey, J.; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Curtis, 35 Ohio St. 343, 357; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 35 Ohio St. 351; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Sutphin, 35 Ohio St. 360.

Upon the ground that where a corporation receives and retains the full benefit of a contract, and a failure to perform on its side would result in palpable injustice to the other contracting party, it is estopped from escaping liability thereunder through a plea of ultra vires, it has been held that an insurance company that has received premiums or assessments on policies issued by it cannot set up the defense of ultra vires to actions on such policies. Denver F. Ins. Co. v. McClelland, 9

4. See the title DISSOLUTION OF CORPORATIONS vol. 9, p. 561.

5. Court Cannot Take Funds from Trustee. — In proceedings for the voluntary dissolution of an insurance company the court has power to decree the distribution of its funds among those entitled thereto, but it has no power to order a trustee to pay over to the receiver appointed in such proceedings funds placed in his hands by the company, pursuant to a contract obligation, for the security of the members or policy holders. Matter of Home Provident Safety Fund Assoc., 129 N. Y. 288.

The Provision of the New York Statute declaring void all transfers of choses in action or other assets of a corporation, made after the filing of a petition for a dissolution thereof, in payment of or as security for a debt does not apply to the extinguishment or satisfaction of the chose in action. Hence where, after the filing of a petition by a mutual insurance company, the maker of a premium note paid an assessment thereon and surrendered his policy under an agreement with the authorized agent of the company for the surrender and extinguishment of the note, it was held that the transaction was valid and the note was extinguished. Sands v. Hill, 55 N. Y. 18.

7. Forfeiture of Charter at Common Law. — Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 594.

Nonuser. — An insurance company does not forfeit its charter because of nonuser by refusing to insure against extra-hazardous risks. Corwin v. Urbana, etc., Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Ohio 6.

Enforcing Termination of Contracts in Equity. — Where insurance companies become insolvent, policy holders generally become creditors of the company for the present value of their policies. Even where the company is not technically insolvent, if it has ceased for a long time to do new business and merely retains money sufficient to pay existing policies as they mature, the policy holders cannot be compelled to remain bound to a moribund con-

(b) By Statute — aa. AT SUIT OF CREDITOR OR STOCKHOLDER. — In some of the United States there are statutes which provide that when insurance companies become insolvent, courts having jurisdiction may, at the suit of a creditor or stockholder, enjoin them from continuing their business and may appoint a receiver to wind up their affairs. In most of the states there are similar statutes relating to private corporations, and such statutes apply to insurance companies although such companies are not expressly mentioned.¹ Some of the provisions of these statutes have received the interpretation of the courts.²

bb. UPON PETITION OF OFFICER DESIGNATED BY STATUTE — (aa) Text of Statutes. — By statute in a number of states it is provided in substance that if, after an examination by the insurance commissioner or other officer mentioned by the statute into the affairs of an insurance company, and upon his petition, or upon the petition of the attorney-general on his information³ to the proper court, and a hearing thereon, at which the company has an opportunity to defend, it shall appear that the company is insolvent, or that its condition is such as to render its continuance in business hazardous to the public or to those who do business with it, or that it has exceeded its corporate powers, or that it has violated the rules, restrictions, or conditions prescribed by law, the court may suspend, restrain, or prohibit the further continuance of business by the company and appoint a receiver or receivers to wind up its affairs.⁴

(bb) Constitutionality. — Such a statute is constitutional. It does not impair the obligation of the contract which the company by its charter has with the state, as in all such charters there is an implied condition that the privileges and franchises conferred upon the corporation shall not be abused or so employed as to defeat the ends for which it is established, and that when so abused or misemployed they may be withdrawn or reclaimed by the state by proper legal proceedings. Nor does such a statute impair the obligation of the contracts of the corporation with its creditors and policy holders.⁵ Nor does it deny to the corporation the equal protection of the laws,⁶ or deprive it of its property without due process of law.⁷

(cc) Construction. — These statutes, like all statutes of a penal nature, must be strictly construed, and the facts of the particular case must be brought

cern, and a court of equity will enforce the termination of their contracts and the payment to them of the present value of their policies. Ingersoll v. Missouri Valley L. Ins. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 530.

1. Insurance Companies Included in Statute Though Not Expressly Mentioned. — Streit v. Citizens F. Ins. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 21.

2. That an Insurance Company Has Ceased to Do Business as Such, that it has reinsured its risks, and that its officers are engaged merely in collecting its assets and paying its debts, are not sufficient reasons for appointing a receiver or issuing an injunction under the New Jersey statute. Streit v. Citizens F. Ins. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 22.

For a construction of the particular provisions of certain statutes, see also Osgood v. Maguire, 61 N. Y. 524; In re Oshkosh Mut. F. Ins. Co., 77 Wis. 366.

3. Under the New York Act of 1853, § 17, application for a dissolution of an insurance company could be made only by the attorney-general; a stockholder could not make such application. Fisher v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co., (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 363.

4. But under the California Statute (Pol. Code, § 601), the court, in decreeing the dissolution of a company, has no power to appoint a receiver or assume control of its effects. State Investment, etc., Co. v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 135.

5. Obligation of Contract Not Impaired. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574; Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593; Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82.

6. No Denial of Equal Protection of Laws. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574.

7. No Deprivation of Property Without Due Process of Law. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Needles, 113 U. S. 574; Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593; Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82; Atty.-Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co., 82 N. Y. 172.

Illinois Statute Constitutional. — The Illinois statute of February 17, 1874, which applies alike to all insurance companies, is not a special law regulating the practice in courts of justice within the prohibition of the state Constitution of 1870, art. 4, § 22. Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82. Nor is this statute void because it does not expressly provide for a trial by jury, as the action, both in its procedure and in its nature and effect, is an equitable one. Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593.

Rights of Creditors. — The decree under these statutes dissolving the corporation and appointing a receiver is in the nature of a judgment in favor of all the creditors, and they are entitled to come in on the distribution and to be heard in respect to their claims, and are subject to the summary jurisdiction of the court in matters pertaining to the administration of the estate of the insolvent corporation.²

(dd) Penalty of Statute Cannot Be Avoided by Voluntary Assignment. — An insurance company that, by insolvency or a violation of the law, has brought itself within the operation of the statute cannot escape therefrom by a voluntary assignment of its property, though made with the consent of the stockholders.³

cc. STANDARD OF SOLVENCY REQUIRED BY STATUTES. — The law requires a higher standard of solvency in an insurance company than that its assets shall be sufficient to meet and pay its matured liabilities. It requires that its assets shall be equal to all its liabilities, whether due or not due.⁴

1. California Statute Does Not Supersede State Insolvent Act. — State Investment, etc., Co. v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 135.

The Condition of a Company Rendering Its Continuance in Business Hazardous to the Insured and the Public justifies dissolution under the Illinois law. Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82.

Where an Action to Wind Up the Company by Creditors and Stockholders Is Pending, an application made by the attorney-general under the provisions of the Wisconsin statute to effect the same purpose was held to have been properly denied. In re Oshkosh Mut. F. Ins. Co., 77 Wis. 366.

The Court Cannot Order Dissolution Without a Hearing on the Merits under the Illinois Act of 1874. Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593.

An Offer by an Insurance Company to Reinsure in other companies for its policy holders is no defense to a proceeding under the Illinois statute. Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82.

No Defense that Mismanagement Is Attributable to Secretary Alone. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82.

Control of Company's Securities. — Under the Missouri statute, when the court dissolves a company and proceeds to wind up its affairs, as a necessary incident it takes possession, through its receiver, of the company's securities. The superintendent of insurance has no control of the securities as trustee, but it is the duty of the court to distribute among those entitled to it the property of the company dissolved. Relfe v. Spear, 6 Mo. App. 129; Relfe v. Columbia L. Ins. Co., 11 Mo. App. 374.

Under the California Statute of March 26, 1868, the insurance commissioner might legally require an insurance company ascertained by him to be insolvent to repair its capital stock without revoking its certificate. Palache v. Pacific Ins. Co., 42 Cal. 418.

For the construction of some of the peculiar provisions of the statutes see also Fry v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 197; Stedman v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co., 45 Conn. 377; Ward v. Farwell, 97 Ill. 593; Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 173, affirmed 75 Mo. 388; Relfe v. Spear, 6 Mo. App. 129; People v. Chapman, 64 N. Y. 557; *Atty.-Gen. v. North America L. Ins. 2. Atty.-Gen. v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 272.

3. Company Cannot Escape Operation of Statute by Voluntary Assignment. — Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 173, affirmed 75 Mo. 388.

In Stedman v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co., 45 Conn. 377, it was held to be no answer to a petition under the statute that by legislative permission the company had transferred all its assets to another company, which had assumed all its liabilities, so long as the holders of the policies had not assented to the arrangement.

But in Alexander v. Williams, 14 Mo. App. 14, it was held that a transaction made in good faith, whereby an insurance corporation, not alleged to be insolvent, having a controlling interest in another corporation, after the demand of a special statement from the latter by the superintendent of insurance, delayed that statement, and, without removing the assets of either corporation from the reach of the superintendent, proceeded to reinsure the risks of the second company, absorbing its assets pro rata as it assumed its burdens, was not necessarily void as in fraud of the statute or as against public policy.

Though the Law Relates Only to Insurance Companies Doing Business in the State, a company that has violated and acted in fraud of the statute while doing business in the state cannot avoid its penalties by making an assignment or by ceasing to take new risks or by any other subterfuge resorted to for the purpose of evading the statute. Relfe v. Commercial Ins. Co., 5 Mo. App. 173, affirmed 75 Mo. 388.

Company Held Insolvent. — See State v. Equitable Indemnity Assoc., 18 Wash. 514.

Guaranty Fund Not Reckoned with Assets to Determine Question of Solvency. — Russell v. Bristol, 49 Conn. 251.

Good Will of Company Not an Asset. — Chicago L. Ins. Co. v. Auditor, 101 Ill. 82.

(3) Rights and Duties of Receivers. — Primarily the receiver of an insolvent insurance company represents the corporation; it is his duty to collect and preserve its assets and property, and to do with them as he may be directed by the court.¹ He possesses whatever rights the corporation possessed and might enforce against its directors or trustees for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office. He is also the trustee of, and represents, the creditors, stockholders, and all interested in the property and assets of the corporation, including policy holders.²

h. FOREIGN COMPANIES — (1) Authority to Transact Business — (a) In General. — The authority of an insurance company to transact business is strictly local, and does not extend as a matter of legal right beyond the state or country in which it is created. It is only by comity that such companies are permitted to do business and make contracts in countries other than that of their creation. There are statutes in most of the civilized states extending this right to foreign companies upon their complying with certain prescribed conditions.³

1. Powers of Appointing Court. — Where a receiver is appointed for an insolvent insurance company, the court making the appointment exercises, at its discretion, the powers of the board of directors as well as such additional authority as is conferred upon it by statute. Rand v. Mutual F. Ins. Co., 58 Ill. App. 528. See generally the title RECEIVERS.

2. Powers and Duties of Receivers. — Meley v. Whitaker, 61 N. J. L. 602, affirming 61 N. J. L. 1; Atty.-Gen. v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 272; Mason v. Henry, 152 N. Y. 529.

The Receiver Has Power to Levy and Collect Assessments on a Premium Note where, by the terms of the note, such power was vested in the directors. Meley v. Whitaker, 61 N. J. L. 602, affirming 61 N. J. L. 1.

As to the Rights of the Liquidator of an Amalgamated Company under the English law, see In re Albert L. Assur. Co., L. R. 11 Eq. 164, 40 L. J. Ch. 166, 23 L. T. N. S. 726, 19 W. R. 321.

Receiver's Right to Securities Deposited with Superintendent of Insurance. — Under the New York Statutes the receiver of an insurance company, unless it be a company issuing registered policies and annuity bonds, cannot compel the superintendent of insurance to deliver to him the securities deposited with him by the company under the provisions of the statute requiring such deposit for the security of policy holders, until the rights of the policy holders have been settled. Ruggles v. Chapman, 59 N. Y. 163, affirming 1 Hun (N. Y.) 321, 2 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 600; Atty.-Gen. v. North America L. Ins. Co., 92 N. Y. 654; People v. Chapman, 64 N. Y. 557; People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co., 147 N. Y. 25, reversing 87 Hun (N. Y.) 229, 81 Hun (N. Y.) 493; Matter of Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co., 13 Hun (N. Y.) 115, affirmed 74 N. Y. 617. Nor is he entitled to receive from the superintendent of insurance the interest collected on the securities deposited. People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co., 147 N. Y. 25, reversing 87 Hun (N. Y.) 229, 81 Hun (N. Y.) 493. But under the special provisions of the New York statute (Laws 1892, c. 690, § 76; Laws 1899, c. 902, §§ 7, 8), the receiver of an insolvent company which issued registered policies and annuity bonds is entitled to receive from the superintendent of insurance the securities deposited with him for the protection of the policy holders. Atty.-Gen. v. North American L. Ins. Co., 80 N. Y. 152, 82 N. Y. 172, 85 N. Y. 485; Smyth v. Munroe, 84 N. Y. 354; People v. American Steam Boiler Ins. Co., 147 N. Y. 25, reversing 87 Hun (N. Y.) 229, 81 Hun (N. Y.) 493.

Minnesota Statute. — An attempted exchange by the insurance commissioner of securities deposited with him by an insurance company for the protection of policy holders under the provisions of the Minnesota statute (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 3332), not made in the manner required by the statute, is void; and a receiver appointed upon the company's becoming insolvent, in order to recover the securities unlawfully exchanged, is required only to tender back such of the securities received in the exchange as have come into his possession. Hayne v. Metropolitan Trust Co., 67 Minn. 245.

As to the Duties and Compensation of an Actuary appointed by a receiver of an insurance company, pursuant to the provisions of Laws New York, 1869, c. 902, see Matter of North American L. Ins. Co., (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 55 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 465.

By Whom Costs of Realizing Assets Are to Be Borne. — A company granted policies of assurance, by the terms of which the assured had no claim against the shareholders beyond the amount unpaid on their shares. Under the winding up, the assets of the company, including the full amount payable on the shares, were applied to paying the policy holders and the general creditors pro rata. It was held that the costs of realizing the assets, in the course of a winding up by the court, ought to be treated as a part of the costs of the winding up, and should be borne wholly by the shareholders. In re Professional L. Assur. Co., L. R. 3 Ch. 167, 17 L. T. N. S. 631, 16 W. R. 295, affirming L. R. 3 Eq. 668.

Special Security Fund Not Chargeable with Costs Incurred in Administering General Fund. — Where an insurance company that has created a special trust fund as security for policy holders becomes insolvent, such fund is not chargeable with any part of the costs or commissions incurred in administering the general fund. American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case, 82 Md. 535.

3. Authority of Foreign Companies to Transact Business. — Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 168;

(b) In United States — aa. RULE STATED. — In the United States an insurance company's authority to transact business is restricted to the state in which it is incorporated, and it cannot transact business in any other state without the consent of such state, express or implied. This consent may be accompanied by such terms, conditions, and restrictions as the state may think proper to impose, if not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States,¹ or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure the jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment from all others, or that principle of natural justice which forbids condemnation without opportunity for defense.² But if there is no statute prohibiting or imposing conditions upon

The legislative enactments of a country have no binding force proprio vigore in another country, and a legislature cannot authorize corporations created by it to carry on business in a foreign country. Where, however, a legislature assumes so to do, such authority is only legislative sanction to the agreement of the incorporators to transact their business abroad as well as at home. Clarke v. Union F. Ins. Co., 10 Ont. Pr. 313.

Status of Company Created in District of Columbia by Congress. — An insurance company created by Act of Congress while Congress was acting as the legislature of the District of Columbia is a "foreign corporation" within the meaning of a state statute imposing upon "foreign corporations" the performance of certain conditions as a prerequisite to their right to transact business in the state. Daly v. National L. Ins. Co., 64 Ind. 1.

Authority of Superintendent of Insurance. — Under the Kansas Act of 1889, c. 159, the superintendent of insurance has no power to refuse to a foreign insurance company a certificate of authority to do business in the state if such company is solvent and has fully complied with the laws of the state. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Boyle, 82 Fed. Rep. 705; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. McNall, 51 Fed. Rep. 888. Prior to the passage of this act the superintendent of insurance had discretionary power to grant or withhold such authority. Dwelling-House Ins. Co. v. Wilder, 40 Kan. 561.

A New York statute provided that the superintendent of insurance might refuse to permit any foreign insurance company to transact business in the state whenever in his judgment such refusal would best promote the interests of the people of the state. Under this statute it was held that where the name of a company seeking to do business in the state bears such a similarity to the name of another company already authorized to do business that confusion will probably result, the superintendent may refuse the authority to do business. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Employers' Liability Ins. Co., 78 Hun (N. Y.) 416.

Prohibition Extending to Foreign Companies as Well as to Their Agents. — Under the Indiana statute of December 21, 1865, the prohibition against doing business in the state without compliance with the statute extended to for-the transaction of business, the presumption, under the law of comity that prevails between the states of the Union, is that the state permits a company organized in a sister state to do any act authorized by its charter or the law under which it is created, unless such act is obnoxious to the policy of the law of the state.¹

State May Prohibit Citizens Contracting with Unauthorized Foreign Companies. — The power to prohibit foreign insurance companies from doing business in a state until they comply with prescribed conditions necessarily carries with it the right to enforce this power by appropriate legislation. The state, therefore, has the right to prohibit a citizen from making a contract in the state with a foreign company which has not complied with the prescribed conditions.²

bb. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES IMPOSING CONDITIONS UPON RIGHT TO TRANSACT BUSINESS — (aa) Such Statutes Do Not Regulate Commerce. — A state statute prescribing certain conditions as a prerequisite to the right of a foreign insurance company to transact business in the state is not a regulation of commerce, and therefore is not a violation of that clause of the Constitution of the United States which vests in Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states."³

(bb) Not in Conflict with Citizenship Clause of Federal Constitution. — Nor is such a statute in conflict with the clause of the Federal Constitution which requires that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."⁴

(cc) Right to Remove Causes into Federal Courts. — A corporation is a citizen of the state by which it is created, within that provision of the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted in pursuance thereof that secure to citizens of another state than that in which suit is brought the right to remove their cases into the federal courts;⁵ and the facts that an insurance company created by the laws of one state does business in another state, in conformity to its laws regulating the transaction of insurance business by foreign companies, and that its agents there are authorized to accept service of process from the courts of the state, do not deprive it of this constitutional right.⁶ Therefore a statute requiring such a company, as a condition precedent to its right to do business in the state, to agree not to remove suits from the state to the federal courts is unconstitutional, and the agreement of a company filed in pursuance of such an unconstitutional act derives no support from it, and is as void as it would be had no such act been passed.⁷

eign insurance companies as well as to the agents of such companies. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 46 Ind. 44.

Foreign Companies Cannot, by the Insertion of Clauses in Their Policies of Insurance, withdraw themselves from the operation of a state statute prohibiting them from doing business in the state except upon the performance of certain conditions. Fletcher v. New York L. Ins. Co., 13 Fed. Rep. 526.

cc. VARIOUS CONDITIONS PRESCRIBED — (aa) In General. — In pursuance of the power to impose conditions upon foreign companies seeking to do business in the state, statutes have been enacted in nearly all of the United States.

(bb) License and What Is Required to Obtain It. — An almost universal condition prescribed by these statutes is that the foreign company or its agents shall obtain from the proper officer a license or certificate of authority to transact business in the state.¹ For this license the payment of a fee is usually required,² and in some states it is required that the certificate of authority be filed with the proper officer of a county in which the company transacts business.³ A compliance with certain conditions is usually required by these statutes as a prerequisite to obtaining the license, and a license issued before such compliance is a nullity.⁴ Some of these conditions are that the company shall file with the proper officer a copy of its charter⁵ or a statement of its financial condition;⁶ that it shall deposit with the state in which it seeks to do business⁷ or with the state in which it was organized⁸ a fund for the Foreign Company Merely Licensed to Do Business in State Not "Organized" in That State. — Where a statute of one of the United States requires foreign companies to deposit a fund with the state in which they are "organized," security of policy holders;¹ that it shall appoint an agent or attorney in the state upon whom legal process may be served;² or constitute the insurance commissioner³ or superintendent of insurance⁴ its attorney to accept service of process;⁵ that it shall become responsible for the acts and neglects of its agents;⁶ that it shall enter into an agreement not to make any contract with any other insurance company to prevent competition between the two companies;⁷ and that it shall possess a certain amount of capital.⁸

a company formed under the laws of a foreign government cannot be considered as organized in another state of the Union where it is merely licensed to do business, so as to meet the requirements of the statute, by a deposit made with such other state. *Employers' Liability Assur. For Whose Protection Deposit Required by Mississippi Statute Was Intended. — The fund required by the Mississippi statute, Code 1871, c. 55, art. 8, to be deposited in the state treasury by a foreign insurance company was intended as a security to protect policies issued to citizens of the state by agents appointed in the mode prescribed by the statute and doing business in the state. Therefore, if a citizen of the state took out a policy in a foreign company from an agent residing and doing business out of the state, he had no claim upon such deposit. Piedmont, etc., L. Ins. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 139 U. S. 223; Maine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 643.

Effect of Constituting Insurance Commissioner Attorney to Receive Process. — A stipulation filed by a foreign insurance company in compliance with a statute requiring such company, before doing business in the state, to file a stipulation agreeing that any legal process affecting such company served on the insurance commissioner should have the same effect as if personally served on the company, does not give to the company a domicile in the state for all purposes, or bring into the state the situs of a debt which it owes elsewhere by reason of business transacted elsewhere. Swedish-American Nat. Bank v. Bleeker, 72 Minn. 383.

Conclusive Presumption of Compliance with Statute. — When a foreign insurance company is shown to have transacted business in a state wherein, by statute, it is made a condition precedent to doing business that it shall constitute the insurance commissioner its attorney to accept service of process, and providing that such service shall be binding on it, a conclusive presumption of compliance with the statute arises, and the company may not question the validity of the service. *Sparks v. (cc) Conditions Relating to Form and Legal Effect of Policies. — The conditions which a state may impose on a foreign company may extend to the form and legal effect of the company's policies; and if, in the course of its business in the state, such a company issues policies on the lives or property of the citizens of the state which contain conditions prohibited by or in contravention of the laws of the state, such conditions are void.¹

(dd) Retaliatory Legislation. — In some states there are statutes imposing upon foreign companies seeking to do business in the state the same obligations and prohibitions that are imposed by the laws of the state of their domicile on companies organized under the laws of the state passing the enactment.² Such a statute is a complete and absolute expression of the legislative will, and though its operation depends on the contingency of legislative action in other states, it is not thereby rendered unconstitutional.³

Such a Statute Becomes Operative on the enactment by another state of a statute imposing obligations or prohibitions upon companies created in the former state, though there are no such companies doing business in the latter state.⁴

Construction of Statutes. — Being retaliatory in character, a statute of this nature must be strictly construed.⁵ A foreign company will not be excluded from the state under its provisions unless it clearly appears that the effect of the foreign law in its practical administration would be to exclude similar companies organized under the laws of the state.⁶

(e) Power of State to Change Conditions of Admission. — A state having the power to exclude foreign companies entirely has the power to change the conditions of admission at any time for the future.⁷

(d) Company Charged with Notice of Conditions Imposed. — A foreign company is bound at its peril to take notice of express provisions of law stating the terms upon which it will be permitted to do business in the state.⁸

Doing Business in the State Brings the Policy Within the Operation of Its Laws, notwithstanding the policy may be signed and the loss made payable in another state. In such cases the company cannot, by any contrivance or device whatever, evade the effect and operation of the laws of the state where it is doing business. Berry v. Knights Templars', etc., L. Indemnity Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 440, affirmed 4 U. S. App. 353, 50 Fed. Rep. 511; Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Clements, 140 U. S. 226, affirming Wall v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc., 32 Fed. 3. Statutes Constitutional. — Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Welch, 29 Kan. 672; Home Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 104 Ill. 653. See generally the titles CONSTITUTIONAL LAWS, vol. 6, p. 1031; STATUTES.

5. Construction. — State v. Fidelity, etc., Ins. Co., 49 Ohio St. 440, 34 Am. St. Rep. 573.

6. People v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 153 Ill. 25; State v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 39 Minn. 538. See also State v. Fidelity, etc., Ins. Co., 49 Ohio St. 440, 34 Am. St. Rep. 573.

Where such a retaliatory statute is in force in a state, any conditions, obligations, or prohibitions imposed by the laws of another state upon companies created in the former state and seeking to do business in the latter, not found in the statutes of such former state, will be treated as if found in so many words in such statutes, and will be enforced accordingly. Talbot v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 74 Md. 536.

The Fact that for Twelve Years No Case Has Arisen calling for the enforcement of such a retaliatory statute does not render the statute inoperative or affect its validity as a binding law. Home Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 104 Ill. 653.

7. State May Change Conditions of Admission. — Thus a state may impose as a condition the payment of a new tax or further tax as a license fee. If it imposes such a license fee as a prerequisite for the future, the foreign company, until it pays such fee, is not entitled to admission within the state or within its jurisdiction. Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. New York, 119 U. S. 110.

8. Company Bound to Take Notice of Conditions Imposed. — Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. State, 9 Kan. 210.

(e) What Constitutes Doing Business Within Meaning of Statutes — Issuing Policy in One State on Property Situated in Another. — It has been generally held that to issue a policy of insurance in one state to a citizen of another state on property situated there is not to "do business" within the latter state.¹

Taking an Application for Insurance in the state by the agent of a foreign insurance company and forwarding it to the company, which alone had authority to accept or reject the application, at the place of its domicile, where it was accepted, and a policy issued thereon, has been held not to be "doing business" in the state.²

The Delivering of Policies and the Taking of Premium Notes in a state by a person compensated therefor by a foreign company, whether he is an accredited agent of the company or a mere insurance broker, constitutes, if the company has not complied with its requirements, a violation of a statute which prescribes the performance of certain conditions as a prerequisite to the right of foreign companies to transact business in the state.³

Business Not in Line of Insurance Not Prohibited. — A statute which forbids foreign insurance companies to "take any risk or transact any business of insurance" in the state without first complying with the requirements of the statute does not prohibit a company from transacting business not in the line of insurance.⁴

To Adjust a Loss by an agent of a foreign company is not to "transact the business of insurance" in the state.⁵

And to Take Subscriptions to the Stock of a Company or to receive notes given in payment therefor, is not to "take risks" or to "transact any business of insurance."⁶

Where a Foreign Company Takes Securities in a State for debts due it by residents of the state, it is not transacting the business of insurance therein.⁷

1. Insuring Property in Another State Not Doing Business Therein. — Marine Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 643; New Orleans v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co., 33 La. Ann. 10; Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Huron Salt, etc., Mfg. Co., 31 Mich. 346; Western Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Girard Point Storage Co., 41 W. N. C. (Pa.) 472. See also Lamb v. Bowser, 7 Biss. (U. S.) 315; Columbia F. Ins. Co. v. Kinyon, 37 N. J. L. 33.

An agent of an insurance company who keeps his office in one state, and there transacts business, but issues policies on houses in another state, and who, on a single occasion, examines a house in the latter state with a view to its insurance, is not "carrying on" the business of insurance within such latter state within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the carrying on of the insurance business without a license. Jackson v. State, 50 Ala. 141.

But in Illinois it has been held that the fact that a contract of insurance on property in that state was made by mail and consummated wholly within another state will not exempt either the foreign company or the agent who procured the application in Illinois from the penalty prescribed by the statute (1 Starr & Curt. Annot. Stat. 1896, c. 73, par. 4) for taking risks or transacting business in the state without a license. Indiana Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. People, 65 Ill. App. 355. See also Buell v. Breese Mill, etc., Co., 65 Ill. App. 271.

And the Prohibition of the Wisconsin Statute (Stat. Wis. 1898, § 1915) that no foreign insurance company "shall directly or indirectly take risks or transact any business of insurance in this state" until it has complied with the conditions prescribed was held to apply to a contract insuring property within the state, though made outside of the state. Rose v. Kimberly, etc., Co., 89 Wis. 545, 46 Am. St. Rep. 855, distinguishing Seamans v. Knapp, 89 Wis. 171, 46 Am. St. Rep. 825. See also Stanhill v. Mutual Mill Ins. Co., 76 Wis. 285.

In Mississippi a statute substantially similar to the Wisconsin statute has received a like construction. Cowan v. London Assur. Corp., 73 Miss. 321.

Doing an "Act to Effect Insurance." — The mailing of a letter or telegraphing of a communication in Louisiana to a foreign insurance company in another state, by which instantly property is insured and the risk becomes attached, is doing an "act" in Louisiana "to effect insurance" within the prohibition of the statute, Acts 1894, No. 66. State v. Allgeyer, 48 La. Ann. 104.

Nor Is the Institution of a Suit by a Foreign Company in the courts of a state doing business in the state.¹

(f) Effect upon Contracts of Noncompliance with Conditions — aa. CONTRACTS VOID IN HANDS OF COMPANY. — Ordinarily where a statute declares that foreign insurance companies shall not transact any business in the state until they have complied with the conditions prescribed by the statute, a contract entered into in the state by a foreign company without complying with such conditions is void, so far as concerns the right of the company or its agents to sue upon it,² and this notwithstanding the statute imposes a penalty upon the company for doing business in the state in violation of its provisions.³ But the whole statute must be examined in order to decide whether it contains anything to indicate that the legislature did not intend to declare a contract made in contravention of its provisions void.⁴

In Indiana the cases on this subject are in the utmost confusion, and it is impossible to reconcile them. But as was said by Coffey, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 134 Ind. 215, the Supreme Court of that state "seems to have settled down upon the doctrine that such contracts are not void, but that the right of the corporation to enforce such contracts is suspended until it has complied with the terms of the statute, and that a failure to perform the duty required by law can only be taken advantage of by way of plea in abatement." The following cases support this rule: Daly v. National L. Ins. Co., 64 Ind. 1; Behler v. German Mut. F. Ins. Co., 68 Ind. 347; American Ins. Co. v. Wellman, 69 Ind. 413; Wiestling v. Warthin, 1 Ind. App. 217. Piggott*, 94 Ind. 14. On the other hand, the following cases support the rule stated in the text: The Rising Sun Ins. Co. v. Slaughter, 20 Ind. 520; Hoffman v. Banks, 41 Ind. 1; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 46 Ind. 44; Cassaday v. American Ins. Co., 72 Ind. 95.

4. Intention of Legislature Must Govern. — The Manistee, 5 Biss. (U. S.) 381, citing Harris v. Runnels, 12 How. (U. S.) 79.

Massachusetts Legislation. — By express provision of the statute in force in Massachusetts before Acts 1887, c. 214, if insurance was made by a foreign company without complying with the requisitions of the statute, the contract was declared valid. Hartford Live Stock Ins. Co. v. Matthews, 102 Mass. 221; Williams v. Cheney, 3 Gray (Mass.) 215; Provincial Ins. Co. v. Lapsley, 15 Gray (Mass.) 262; National Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Pursell, 10 Allen (Mass.) 231; Lester v. Webb, 5 Allen (Mass.) 569; Leonard v. Washburn, 100 Mass. 251. But under Acts 1887, c. 214, a contract of insurance made by a foreign company without complying with the requisitions of the statute is void. Claflin v. U. S. Credit System Co., 165 Mass. 501, 52 Am. St. Rep. 528.

Under the New Hampshire Statute (Gen. Stat., c. 159, § 10) which declared that a contract of insurance made by a foreign insurance company should be valid against the company although it had not complied with the conditions prescribed by statute, it was held that a foreign insurance company might recover in an action upon a premium note given as the consideration for a contract of insurance made in the state, although the company had not complied with the conditions prescribed. Union Ins. Co. v. Smart, 60 N. H. 458.

Indiana Statute Construed. — Where a foreign insurance company, prior to making contracts of insurance in Indiana, has substantially complied with the provisions of the statute (now Horner's Stat. Ind. 1896, § 3765) requiring the performance of certain conditions by such companies as a prerequisite to their right to do Statute Does Not Affect Contracts Made Before Its Enactment. — Such a statute does not affect the validity of a contract made by a foreign company before the passage of the statute.¹

Where Statutory Requirement Is Not Condition Precedent to Right to Do Business. — Where the doing of an act which the state requires of foreign insurance companies transacting business in the state is not made a condition precedent to the right of the company to do business in the state, a failure by the company to do the act will not render invalid a contract made with it.²

bb. RIGHT OF HOLDER WITHOUT NOTICE OF PREMIUM NOTE. — A recovery may be had on a note given to a foreign insurance company for a premium of insurance at the suit of one who is a bona fide holder of the note without notice that the conditions prescribed by the statute have not been complied with.³

Notice of Noncompliance with Statutory Conditions Bars Recovery. — But if one takes such a note knowing, or with reasonable cause to know, when he takes it, that the statutory conditions have not been complied with, he cannot recover thereon.⁴

cc. PRESUMPTIONS IN SUITS ON PREMIUM NOTES — (aa) Performance of Statutory Requirements Prima Facie Presumed. — In an action on a premium note given to a foreign insurance company, the performance by the company of the acts required by statute to entitle it to transact business in the state will be presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary.⁵

business in that state, its contracts are not rendered void by the fact that a certified copy of the statement required to be filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court of the county wherein the company establishes its agency fails, through the neglect of the auditor of the state, to contain a copy of the company's act of incorporation. American Ins. Co. v. Butler, 70 Ind. 1.

Premium Note Given as Agent for Citizen of Another State. — A promissory note given by a resident of a state for a premium on a policy of insurance made to him there by a foreign company which had not complied with the statutory conditions is void in the hands of the company, although the person giving the note was a mere agent for a citizen of another state who was the owner of the property insured, and the policy was expressed to be "for whom it may concern." Williams v. Cheney, 8 Gray (Mass.) 206.

Company's Right to Recover from Carrier. — It has been held that in case of a loss on a policy issued by a foreign company without complying with the statutory requirements, a carrier will not be permitted to make such noncompliance by the company a defense to a libel, the loss having been paid by the company. The Maister, 5 Biss. (U. S.) 381; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 134 Ind. 215.

Validity of Subscriptions to Capital Stock. — A statute making it unlawful for foreign insurance companies to "take risks" or "transact any business of insurance" within the state except upon certain conditions does not invalidate subscriptions made to the capital stock of such corporations, or notes given in payment therefor, as these are not "risks" or "business of insurance." Bartlett v. Chouteau Ins. Co., 18 Kan. 369.

Contract Evading Statute Void for Contravening Policy of State. — A contract insuring property in Michigan was made through the mails by a resident of Michigan with an insurance company in another state which had not complied with the conditions prescribed to entitle it to transact business in Michigan. It was held that, even conceding that the contract was not made in Michigan, and that it evaded the statute, yet, as it was in contravention of the policy of the state, it would not sustain an action against the insured for an assessment. Seamans v. Temple Co., 105 Mich. 400, 55 Am. St. Rep. 457.

And so it has been held in Iowa and Minnesota under like statutes, and in cases where the facts were substantially similar to those in the above case. *Seamans v. Under a statute requiring the agencies of foreign insurance companies to take out licenses, and prescribing a penalty for their failure to do so, a neglect by an agency to procure a license will not render the policies of the company void, or disable it from maintaining or defending suits. Columbus Ins. Co. v. Walsh, 18 Mo. 229. See also Clark v. Middleton, 19 Mo. 54.

3. Williams v. Cheney, 3 Gray (Mass.) 215.

4. Williams v. Cheney, 8 Gray (Mass.) 206.

What Is Sufficient Evidence of Notice. — And the fact that the person taking such a note was a director, treasurer, or one of the executive committee of the company is sufficient evidence that he had reasonable cause to know of the company's noncompliance with the statutory conditions. Williams v. Cheney, 8 Gray (Mass.) 206.

5. Presumption as to Performance of Statutory Conditions. — Cassaday v. American Ins. Co., 72 Ind. 95; Williams v. Cheney, 3 Gray (Mass.) 215; American Ins. Co. v. Smith, 73 Mo. 368; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Stone, 42 Mo. App. 383.

(bb) Presumption as to Place Where Note Was Made. — In an action on a premium note by a foreign company that has not complied with the statutory conditions entitling it to do business in the state, if the note is payable generally, and does not indicate the place where it was made, it will not be presumed that it was given in the state in violation of the statute. The plaintiff, therefore, in the absence of proof that the note was given in the state, may recover without proving that it had complied with the requisitions of the statute.¹

dd. COMPANY ESTOPPED TO ALLEGE WANT OF AUTHORITY. — Though a failure to comply with the laws of the state invalidates a contract made therein in the hands of the foreign company, it does not operate to the prejudice of the policy holders. The public has the right, in absence of bad faith and of actual knowledge to the contrary, to presume that a foreign company assuming to transact business in the state is acting lawfully, and the company, when sued upon a policy issued under such circumstances, is estopped to allege that it had no lawful authority to issue the policy. It can reap no advantage from its own wrong.²

(g) Revocation of License to Transact Business. — A state may revoke the license granted to a foreign insurance company to transact business within her territory,³ and the motives of her action in so doing are not the subject of judicial inquiry.⁴ Thus the legislature of one of the United States may provide that if a foreign company exercises a right to which it is entitled under the Constitution of the United States, its license shall be revoked.⁵

But in Kansas it has been held that before a foreign company can recover in an action brought by it to enforce a contract relating to the insurance business, it must allege and prove affirmatively that at the time of such contract it had qualified itself for transacting the business of insurance in the state by complying with the requisitions of the statute. Gilbert v. State Ins. Co., 3 Kan. App. 1.

3. Revocation of License. — American Ins. Co. v. Stoy, 41 Mich. 385.

Not Deprivation of Property Without Due Process of Law. — A statute empowering the insurance commissioner to revoke the license of a foreign insurance company for a violation of the conditions upon which the license was granted is valid, and does not contravene the constitutional inhibition against deprivation of property without due process of law. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 485.

5. Revocation for Exercising a Constitutional Right. — Doyle v. Continental Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 535. In this case the legislature of Wisconsin enacted that if any foreign insurance company transferred a suit brought against it from the state courts to the federal courts, the secretary of state should revoke and cancel its license to do business within that state. It was held that an injunction to restrain him from so doing because such a transfer was made could not be sustained. Mr. Justice Hunt, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "It is said that we thus indirectly sanction what we condemn when presented directly; to wit, that we enable the state of Wisconsin to enforce an agreement to abstain from the federal courts. This is an 'inexact statement.' The effect of our decision in this respect is that the state may compel the foreign company to abstain from the federal courts or to cease to do business in the state. It gives the company the option. This is justifiable, because the complainant has no constitutional right to do business in that state. That state has authority at any time to declare that it shall not transact business there." See also

(h) Penalties Imposed for Transacting Business Without Complying with Statutory Requirements. — As a state has the power to prohibit a foreign insurance company from doing business within its limits, it has the right to make its prohibition effective by penal enactments,¹ and in many of the United States there are statutes making it a criminal or penal offense for foreign companies or their agents to transact business within the state without first complying with the statutory conditions.² Some of the provisions of these statutes have received the interpretation of the courts.³

Company Cannot Recover on Instalment Notes After Revocation. — Where the commissioner of insurance, in pursuance of a statute authorizing him to do so, has revoked the authority of a foreign insurance company to do business within the state, it cannot thereafter recover on instalment notes upon which, by the terms of its policies, payments fall due in advance. American Ins. Co. v. Stoy, 41 Mich. 385.

Provision for Notice to Company Not Essential. — The validity of a statute requiring the revocation of the license of an insurance company in a certain contingency is not affected by the fact that no provision for notice to the company is made. State v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 175, 22 Am. Rep. 692.

3. What Constitutes Agency. — One who solicits its insurance through an agent, places it in a foreign company, and receives and delivers the policy, is an agent for such foreign company, and as such is liable to the penalty imposed upon the agents of unauthorized foreign companies. Lauck v. Myers, 5 Pa. Dist. 377.

Where a foreign company has issued policies on applications procured by A, neither the company nor A, in a suit against them to recover the penalty imposed for transacting business in the state without a license, can plead that A had no authority to act as the company's agent. Indiana Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. People, 65 Ill. App. 355.

As to who is an agent of a foreign company within the meaning of that word as defined by the Alabama statute, see Ex p. Robinson, 86 Ala. 622.

As to who are agents of insurance companies, see infra, this title, Insurance Agents — Who Are Insurance Agents.

Penalty Applies Only to Act Done in State by Company's Agent. — The penalty of a state statute which declares that "it shall not be lawful for any person to act within this state, as agent or otherwise," in receiving or procuring application for insurance or in any manner aiding in "transacting the insurance business of any company or association not incorporated under the laws of this state," until he shall have complied with the conditions of the statute, applies only when the actual agency is in the state and the thing done is actually done in the state. It is not a violation of the statute, for a person in the state to act as attorney for an applicant to a foreign insurance company, provided he acts in good faith as attorney for the applicant only, and not as agent of the company under cover of an attorneyship for the applicant. People v. Imlay, 20 Barb. (N. Y.) 68.

(2) Obligations and Liabilities of Companies That Have Become Domesticated.

— Where a foreign insurance company has sought and obtained the privilege of carrying on its business in a state under regulations fixed by the statutes of the state, and has established a permanent general agency, and conducts its business in the state as a distinct organization in the same manner as domestic corporations, it will be regarded, as to the business transacted there, as domiciled, and subject to the same obligations and liabilities as domestic corporations.¹

IV. INSURANCE AGENTS — 1. Who Are Insurance Agents — a. IN GENERAL

— (1) At Common Law. — An insurance agent is an agent employed by an insurer, usually an insurance company, to perform some act or acts in furtherance of the business of his principal. In a narrower but more familiar sense the term is used to designate those agents employed to solicit risks and effect insurances. While it is not necessary to prove an express contract between an insurance company and one alleged to be its agent to establish the relation of principal and agent between them, either that must be done or the conduct of the parties must be such that the relation may be inferred therefrom.² Whether, upon a given state of facts, one is or is not to be deemed the agent of the insurer, has generally been held to be a question of law.³ That the Fact of Agency Not Essential to Conviction. — Under a statute which makes it a misdemeanor for any person to perform any of certain acts for a foreign company that has not complied with the statutory requirements, one who does any of the prohibited acts for such a company is liable to conviction, whether he is or is not in fact an agent. Smith v. State, 18 Tex. App. 69. See also State v. Farmer, 49 Wis. 459.

Owner of Property Insured Not Liable to Penalty. — Under the Pennsylvania Act of April 26, 1837 (P. L. 61), the owner of property may insure it in an unauthorized foreign company without incurring the penalty of the statute. Conn. v. Biddle, 139 Pa. St. 605, 27 W. N. C. (Pa.) 287.

One Acting in the State as the Agent of Citizens of Another State engaged in the insurance business, but not incorporated or associated as a partnership, is not liable for the penalty imposed by the Illinois statute. Rev. Stat. 1874, p. 593, § 22. Barnes v. People, 168 Ill. 425.

Prima Facie Evidence that Company Was Engaged in Insurance Business. — In a prosecution for a violation of a statute prohibiting any one from acting without a license as agent for a foreign company "engaged in the transaction of insurance business," the fact that the alleged principal of the defendant was engaged in the insurance business is shown prima facie by evidence that the contract made by the defendant for such a principal was one of insurance. State v. Phelan, 66 Mo. App. 548.

Penalty May Be Recovered for Each Separate Offense. — In a suit to recover the statutory penalty imposed upon a foreign company for transacting business in the state without complying with the statutory conditions, a recovery may be had for each separate and distinct offense. So where two distinct offenses are committed by issuing policies to two different persons at different times, two penalties may be recovered in one suit. Indiana Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. People, 65 Ill. App. 355.

Under a statute prohibiting an agent of any foreign company from soliciting insurance for such company without complying with the statutory requirements, and prescribing a penalty for each offense, one who, in violation of the statute, placed policies for eighteen different companies, although he solicited for all of such companies at the same time and placed the policies with the same person on the same property, was held to be guilty of a separate offense for each policy placed, and liable for the statutory penalty in each case. State v. Farmer, 49 Wis. 459.

insurer held one out as agent or recognized his acts done as agent, has been held sufficient to establish agency.¹ But agency cannot be proven by the declarations and acts of the alleged agent unknown to the insurer.²

The Medical Examiner of an Insurance Company, as such, is not the agent of the company for the purpose of soliciting or filing out applications for insurance.³

(2) By Statute. — In some of the United States there are statutes declaring what persons shall be considered agents of insurance companies.⁴

b. GENERAL AGENTS. — A person authorized by an insurance company to accept risks, to agree upon and settle the terms of insurance, and to carry them into effect by issuing and renewing policies, is a general agent of the company,⁵ though he represents his principal only in a particular locality or within a limited territory, and is therefore called a local agent.⁶

Evidence of General Agency. — It has been held that the possession of blank policies and renewal receipts signed by the president and secretary of an insurance company is evidence of a general agency.⁷ So, too, the doing of acts which involve general powers, with the knowledge of and without objection from the insurance company, is admissible in evidence to prove the relation.⁸

c. SUBAGENTS. — A general agent of an insurance company may, in the

8. An Affidavit Made on Behalf of an Insurance Company to procure a continuance of a case to which the company was a party, to which affidavit the company made no opposition, is ad-

due prosecution of the business of his principal, delegate to another authority to do any act within the scope of his authority; and the acts of a subagent done in pursuance of such delegated authority will have the same effect as if done by the general agent himself. In such case the subagent becomes the agent and direct representative of the principal.¹ And the fact that he is compensated for his services by a commission on the business which he brings in does not affect his legal status or make him an insurance broker.²

A Provision in an Insurance Policy that no one not holding the commission of the company shall be considered as its agent does not prevent the agent's employment of the usual and necessary assistance to enable him properly to perform his duties to the company as commissioned agent or affect the legal status of subagents so employed.³

d. BROKERS. — Ordinarily an insurance broker is the agent of the insured and not of the insurer. He may, however, under certain circumstances and for certain purposes, become the agent of the insurer.⁴

2. Insurer's Agent Not Agent of Insured — a. RULE STATED. — The agent of an insurance company through whom a policy is effected cannot be considered in any sense as the agent of the insured in any matter connected with the issuing of the policy.⁵ So where the agent undertakes to prepare the missile in evidence to show that the person making the affidavit was the general agent of the company. Parker v. Citizens Ins. Co., 129 Pa. St. 533. See also Schreiber v. German-American Hail Ins. Co., 43 Minn. 367.

In British-America Assur. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Colo. App. 25, an insurance agent who was also the agent of the owner of a building for leasing it and collecting the rents was instructed by the owner to insure the building. The agent stated that he represented several insurance companies, and the owner then directed him to insure in his own companies, but did not specify the amount of insurance or designate the particular companies. The agent procured a policy in one of the companies and paid the premium out of rents which he held as agent of the insured. It was held that he acted in the transaction as agent of the insurance company, and not as agent of the insured.

Agent with Limited Powers Procuring Change in Policy Already Delivered. — An insurance agent whose power is limited to delivering to the assured a policy of insurance and receiving for the company the premium thereon acts as the agent of the assured, and not of the company, if after delivering the policy to the assured he receives from the assured an application for a change therein and undertakes to procure such change. Duluth Nat. Bank v.

application of the insured, or makes any representations to him as to the character or effect of the statements of the application, he will be regarded in doing so as the agent of the company, and not of the insured;¹ and his legal status in this respect is not affected by a stipulation inserted in the policy subsequently issued that the acts of such agent in making out the application shall be deemed the acts of the insured.² The insurer cannot limit the agency by instructions to the agent that he is agent only for the purpose of receiving and transmitting the application and the premium.³

Agent of Insurer Procuring Policies from Other Insurers. — Where an insurance agent procures several policies for a person, one in his own company and the others in several other companies, he acts, in procuring the former policy, as the agent of the company.⁴ But whose agent he is in reference to the other policies is a question upon which the cases are conflicting and not very clear.⁵

b. EFFECT OF PROVISIONS IN APPLICATION OR POLICY. — Where the party effecting the insurance is in fact the agent of the insurance company, a provision in the application or in the policy declaring that such party shall be deemed the agent of the insured cannot change his legal status;⁶ and the fact that he is the agent of the company may be shown by parol, notwithstanding such a provision in the policy.¹

3. Statutory Regulation of Agents. — In some of the United States there are statutes forbidding agents of insurance companies to act as such without a license, and requiring them to comply with certain conditions before a license shall be granted. Most of these statutes prescribe a penalty for a violation of their provisions.²

4. Powers, Rights, Duties, and Liabilities of Agent — a. IN RESPECT TO PRINCIPAL — (1) Powers and Rights — (a) In General. — The powers and rights of an insurance agent as regards his principal are, in the main, governed by the rules of law applicable to agents in general.³ Where there is an express contract its terms will govern.⁴

(b) Right to Compensation. — Thus where there is an express contract for the compensation of the agent, no proof of a general custom as to the compensation which is in conflict with its terms is admissible.⁵ But evidence of a well-established custom among insurance companies not in conflict with the terms of the contract is admissible to explain it, especially where its language is technical or ambiguous.⁶

Additional Insurance Secured by Another Agent. — Where an agent of an insurance company employed on a commission basis procures an application for insurance, and subsequently another agent of the company induces the applicant to increase the amount of the application, the former agent is not entitled to his commission on the additional insurance thus secured.⁷

Estoppel of Agent to Deny Terms of Employment. — Where an insurance agent receives a general circular from his company, containing in clear language the terms of his compensation, and acts on that circular without complaint for several years, he is estopped to deny that he was employed on those terms, and the production of a circular of prior date with other terms of compensation does not alter the case.⁸

Compensation of Subagents. — The general agent of an insurance company charged with the duty of appointing subagents has authority to fix the compensation of such subagents, and when, acting as agent, he so fixes their compensation, the company, and not he, is responsible to them for the amount fixed.¹ But of course the company is not liable where the contract expressly provides that the subagent shall have no claim against it.²

The Peculiar Provisions of Certain Contracts relating to the compensation of agents, especially in relation to their application to certain facts, have received the interpretation of the courts.³

Forfeiture of Compensation for Misconduct or Breach of Trust. — In contracts of employment between insurance companies and their agents there is an implied condition that the agent will perform the duties incident to his employment honestly, and will do nothing injurious to his employer's interests; and that if he proves radically unfaithful to his trust, or is guilty of gross misconduct, he forfeits all right to compensation.⁴ But his misconduct and infidelity must be gross and aggravated before such consequences will follow; ordinary or slight misconduct will not work a forfeiture of his compensation.⁵

(2) Duties and Liabilities — (a) In General. — An insurance agent is bound to serve the company in good faith to the best of his ability, and if he is careless or negligent in the transaction of his business, or acts in bad faith toward the company, he is liable for any damages which the company may sustain through such negligence or want of good faith.⁶

(b) Liability for Writing Insurance Contrary to Instructions. — An agent who writes insurance contrary to his instructions is liable to his principal for the loss resulting from his disobedience.⁷ But he is not liable if his act is ratified by

1. Compensation of Subagents Fixed by General Agent. — Cotton States L. Ins. Co. v. Mallard, 57 Ga. 64.

But see Cotton States L. Ins. Co. v. Mallard, 57 Ga. 64, holding that if a general agent, in fixing the compensation of a subagent, exceeds his powers limited in the contract between him (the general agent) and the company, the company will still be bound to the subagent who had no knowledge of the restriction, and the general agent who exceeded his powers will be bound to reimburse the company.

3. Peculiar Provisions Construed. — Stier v. Imperial L. Ins. Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 843, holding that a contract giving to the agent commissions on several distinct classes of policies to be issued by the company is not violated by a failure of the company to lend its support and co-operation in placing policies of a particular class, though the placing of that class of policies is more profitable to the agent than the placing of policies belonging to the other classes; Ensworth v. New York L. Ins. Co., 1 Flipp. (U. S.) 92 (entire or divisible contract); Bankers L. Ins. Co. v. Stephens, 53 Neb. 660 (contract providing that the agent's compensation should be a certain percentage of the premiums collected and remitted on risks written by him; that for the first fifteen months he should have a salary of two hundred dollars per month, and if the income from the commission part of the contract should run more than the salary, he should be entitled to the benefit thereof; and that, in consideration of the contract as a whole, he should turn in to the company two hundred thousand dollars of insurance executed and paid for in the first

7. Liability for Writing Insurance in Disobedience of Instructions. — Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Ames, 39 Minn. 150; Sun Fire Office v. Ermentrout, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 21.

An Insurance Company Cannot Recover Substantial Damages from its agent through whose fault, while acting in good faith, it is drawn into a contract of insurance covered by its rates, somewhat different from what it supposed, but not less valuable to it. The court did not decide whether, in such case, the company could recover nominal damages. State Ins. Co. v. Richmond, 71 Iowa 519.

the principal, and a failure to repudiate may have the effect of a ratification. Such a failure, however, will not be tantamount to an approval of the agent's acts unless continued for more than a reasonable length of time allowable for looking into the case.¹

(c) Liability for Neglect to Cancel Policies. — Where an agent of an insurance company whose agency extends to the cancellation of policies receives orders to cancel a policy, and does not do so within a reasonable time, he will be liable for any loss resulting to the company from his negligence;² and the fact that he believed that the company was mistaken as to the safety or danger of the risk, or as to the wisdom of retaining it, will not excuse his delay.³ Nor will the fact that he gave notice of the cancellation to the broker who negotiated the insurance relieve him from liability. The broker in such case is the agent's agent.⁴ And it is not competent for the purpose of relieving the agent of liability to prove a custom to procure the cancellation of policies by the agency of the broker who negotiated the insurance.⁵

How Direction to Cancel Must Be Given. — In order to make it the duty of an insurance agent to cancel policies, it is not necessary that the order to do so should be given in the form of a command. The expression of a wish by the company may fairly be presumed to be an order.⁶

It Is Not Contributory Negligence on the part of the company that it does not itself proceed to cancel a policy on the failure of the agent to do so in accordance with his instructions.⁷

Waiver of Cancellation. — If, after requesting the cancellation of a policy, the conduct of the company is such as to mislead the agent into the belief that it has acquiesced in its noncancellation, the cancellation is waived, and the company cannot recover from the agent the loss sustained by reason of his failure to cancel.⁸

The Measure of Damages, in an action by an insurance company against its agent to recover for a loss resulting to the company from the neglect of the agent in not canceling a policy when so directed by the company, is the loss suffered by the company in consequence of such neglect.⁹

Failure to Notify Principal of Issuance of Policy. — Where the contract of an insurance agent with his principal requires him to notify the principal of the issuance of a policy on the day of its issuance, in order that the principal may exercise its right to cancel the policy, and as a result of the agent's failure so to notify the principal the latter is compelled to pay a loss under the policy, which it would have canceled had it been duly notified, the principal is entitled to recover from the agent the loss thus resulting from his negligence. State Ins. Co. v. Jamison, 79 Iowa 245.

Counsel Fees and Costs. — Where the company, on reasonable grounds, defends a suit brought on a policy which the agent had neglected to cancel, and notifies the agent that it

(d) Duty to Preserve Rights Created for Principal. — The power of an insurance agent to create rights by contract for his principal includes an implied duty to preserve, and not to defeat or destroy, those rights; and if he does defeat them, he will be liable to the principal for the resulting loss.¹

(e) Liability of Sureties on Agents' Bonds. — The liability of sureties on the bonds of insurance agents is governed by the terms of the contract,² and it is no defense to an action against them that they were ignorant as to the extent of the obligation assumed, or were misled by their principal in reference thereto, in the absence of proof that the insurance company was a party to the fraud.³

The Mere Failure of the Company Promptly to Notify the Surety of the Default of the principal will not discharge the surety.⁴

Foreign Insurance Company Without License to Do Business. — In an action on the bond of an agent of a foreign insurance company to recover the amount of premiums collected by the agent but not accounted for, it is no defense that the contracts between the company and the insured were invalid by reason of the company's not having complied with the statutory conditions entitling it to do business in the state.⁵

Sureties on the Bond of a General Agent are liable for a deficit caused by the failure of the subagents to pay over to the general agent moneys received by them.⁶

b. IN RESPECT TO ASSURED — (1) Power to Bind Principal — (a) In General. — Agreeably to the general law of agency, an insurance company is bound by the acts⁷ and representations⁸ of its agents done and made within the scope of their employment and authority, and by their knowledge of facts⁹ and receipt of notices¹⁰ affecting the business which they are authorized to conduct.

Subrogation of General Agent to Rights of Company. — Where a general agent of an insurance company had appointed a local agent and had taken a bond from him in the name of the company, with sureties, conditioned that the local agent should pay over all moneys received by him, and the general agent paid to the company certain premiums received by the local agent but not accounted for by him, it was held in a suit upon the bond that such settlement by the general agent with the company did not operate to discharge the bond, but that the general agent would be subrogated to the rights of the company in respect thereof. Hough v. Aetna L. Ins. Co., 57 Ill. 318, 11 Am. Rep. 18.

(b) Nature and Extent of Authority — aa. REAL AUTHORITY — (aa) General Agents. — A general agent of an insurance company may bind his principal by any act or agreement within the ordinary scope and limit of the insurance business which is not known by the assured to be beyond the authority granted to the agent.¹ Thus he may waive conditions in a policy issued through his agency, in the absence of any limitation upon his authority known to the other party,² and may alter a description of the property insured, in order to render it accurate.³

General Agent's Clerks. — An insurance company is responsible not only for the acts of its general agent, but also for the acts of his clerks or employees to whom he delegates authority to discharge his functions within the scope of his agency.⁴

(bb) Special Agents — aaa. In General. — When it is known that an agent of an insurance company is exercising mere special powers, the person dealing with him is bound at his peril to ascertain the scope of the agent's authority,⁵ and the company will not be bound by the acts, representations, or knowledge of facts of such agent beyond the scope of his employment.⁶

renewal of a policy,¹ or by his construction of its provisions;² nor has such an agent the power to vary the terms³ or to waive a condition of the policy,⁴ or to bind the company by his consent to additional insurance,⁵ or in writing on the back of the policy to consent to its assignment.⁶

ccc. Collecting Agents. — An agent employed by an insurance company merely to collect and forward the premiums upon policies cannot bind the company by his waiver of any of the terms of the policy⁷ or by his consent to additional insurance.⁸

ddd. Adjusters. — An agent whose business it is to adjust losses may bind the company by his waiver of the proof of loss⁹ or by his compromise of the loss,¹⁰ but he has no power to waive the forfeiture of a policy.¹¹

bb. OSTENSIBLE AUTHORITY — (aa) In General. — When a person deals with an agent in ignorance of the powers granted to him, the liability of the principal is coextensive with the agent's ostensible authority. If an insurance company clothes an agent with apparent authority to do an act, the company will be bound by the act when done, although the agent may not actually have been vested with authority to do it.¹² The question is not so much what authority the agent had in point of fact, as it is what powers a third person dealing with him had the right to suppose he possessed, judging from his acts and the acts of his principal.⁴

(bb) Effect of Private Instructions to Agent. — Hence, although an agent must answer to his principal for departing from his private instructions, the principal is bound by the acts of the agent so far as third persons dealing with him are concerned. If the agent is apparently exercising general powers in respect to insurance, the principal cannot discharge himself from liability upon a contract made by the agent by setting up private instructions to such agent which were wholly unknown to the insured when he entered into the contract.²

(cc) Acts Done After Termination of Agency. — The acts of a person apparently having authority will bind the company when such person has been the agent of the company and third parties who have dealt with him as such have had no notice of the revocation of his authority.³

cc. WAIVER OF LIMITATION AND RATIFICATION OF ACTS. — Although an agent may have no authority to perform an act, yet if the company subsequently waives the limitation and sanctions what he has done, it cannot afterwards object to his want of authority.⁴

(e) Effect of Limitation in Policy. — A provision in a policy of insurance that the agent shall have no power to waive, modify, or strike from the policy any of the printed conditions, is no restriction upon the power of the agent to make a contract of insurance,⁵ but limits the power of the agent after the contract has been consummated and the policy issued.⁶

(2) Personal Liability — (a) Liability for Sums Received as Premiums — aa. WHERE AGENT FAILS TO DELIVER POLICY. — One who pays to an insurance agent a certain sum as an insurance premium, upon the understanding that he is to have a policy, may, if no policy is issued to him, recover from the agent the amount so paid.⁷

bb. WHERE PERSON INDUCED BY FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS TO INSURE. — A person who is induced by the false and fraudulent representations of the agent of an

The fact that property is so situated that it is the agent's duty to refuse to insure it under instructions given to him by the company will not affect the validity of a policy issued by an agent having general authority to make contracts of insurance and accepted in good faith by the insured without knowledge of the agent's instructions. *Hartford F. Delivery During Life of Assured. — If a policy of life insurance declares on its face that it shall not be binding unless delivered while the person whose life is insured is in good health, the agent cannot make the policy binding upon the company by delivering it to the beneficiary after the death of the assured. McClave v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Assoc., 55 N. J. L. 187.

Mode of Waiver. — Where a policy provides that nothing less than a distinct, specific agreement indorsed on or attached to the policy will be construed as a waiver of any printed or written conditions or restrictions therein, a local agent of the insurance company cannot waive any of the provisions of the policy, except in the mode provided for. *Enos v. insurance company to take out a policy in the company and to pay the premium thereon may rescind the contract, and, in an action against the agent for the tort, recover as damages the amount of the premium so paid.¹

cc. WHERE COMPANY HAS NO AUTHORITY TO DO BUSINESS. — If an agent of an insurance company issues a policy and receives the premium after the company's certificate of authority to do business in the state has been revoked, the person thus paying the premium may recover it from the agent; and this though at the time of taking the premium the agent was not aware of the revocation, and the statutory requirements as to publication of notice of revocation had not been complied with.²

dd. WHEN COMPANY BECOMES INSOLVENT BEFORE RECEIVING PREMIUM. — Where a party insuring has paid the premium to the agent of the company, and before the agent has paid it over or assumed any liability on account of it the company becomes insolvent, and such party notifies the agent that he claims the money, and does not rely upon the policy issued to him, which is worthless, he may recover back the premium in a suit against the agent.³ But he cannot recover without proving that he has offered to return the policy, or that it is worthless.⁴

(b) Liability for Neglect to Effect Insurance. — Where an insurance agent contracts with a person to effect for him a policy of insurance and receives from him a premium thereon, he will doubtless be liable for the damages resulting from his neglect to do so.⁵ But an agent cannot be held liable for negligence in not forwarding promptly an application for insurance, where he refused to forward the only application authorized by the applicant, and several days later forwarded one prepared by himself.⁶

(c) Liability for Loss Resulting from Unauthorized Acts or Representations. — Where a person is induced by the unauthorized acts or representations of an insurance agent to enter into a contract of insurance, the agent will be personally liable for any loss sustained by such person in consequence of such acts or representations.⁷

(d) Where Agency Is of Foreign Company Not Authorized to Do Business. — An agent who issues a policy in a foreign insurance company that has not complied with the statutory requirements entitling it to do business in the state is personally liable to the policy holder for any loss occurring under the policy.⁸

5. Termination of Agency — a. HOW IT MAY BE TERMINATED — At Election of Either Party. — As a general rule a contract between an insurance company

1. Insurance Induced by Fraud. — Hedden v. Griffin, 136 Mass. 229, 49 Am. Rep. 25.

But it has been held that an action cannot be maintained by the holder of an insurance policy against the agents of the insurance company for premiums paid to them, when it appears that the policy on which the premiums were paid conforms to the application and is in accordance with the agreements of such agents. 5. Failure to Procure Policy. — Haight v. Kremer, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 50, 29 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 30; Stadler v. Trever, 86 Wis. 42.

6. Negligence in Forwarding Application — Conversion of Policy. — The plaintiff applied to insurance brokers for insurance on his vessel. The brokers filled out an application and sent it to the agent of an insurance company. The agent refused to forward the application to his company unless the valuation was raised. This was not acceded to by the brokers, but the agent filled out an application with the valuation increased, and forwarded it to the company. On the day when it was mailed the vessel was lost, and four days thereafter the agent received by telegram an order from the company to decline the risk and return the policy. The policy was received by the agent on the next day, and was returned at once. It was held that the plaintiff had no right to an action against the agent for negligence in forwarding the application, as he had refused to forward the only application authorized by the plaintiff, nor could he recover for conversion of the policy by the agent, as the property in it never passed out of the company. Buck v. Knowlton, 21 Can. Sup. Ct. 371.

7. Loss Sustained in Consequence of Agent's Unauthorized Acts or Representations. — Kroeger v. Pitcairn, 101 Pa. St. 311, 47 Am. Rep. 718.

8. Agent of Foreign Company. — Morton v. Hart, 88 Tenn. 427.

and one employed by it as its agent is determinable at the election of either party.¹

Or It May Be Terminated by Operation of Law where incapacity in either party to maintain the relation is brought about.²

The Exceptions to This Rule as Concerns the Right of the Principal to Revoke the Agency are where the power to revoke is restrained by express stipulation³ or where the agency is coupled with an interest in the subject-matter.⁴ The contract right of an agent to commissions on renewal policies is not such an interest as will prevent the principal terminating the agency at his will.⁵

b. EFFECT OF TERMINATION — (1) Agent's Power to Bind Principal Ceases. — The power of the agent to act for the principal or to bind it by his acts ceases upon the termination of the agency.⁶

(2) Right to Commissions on Renewal Policies. — Though the cases leave some ground for doubt, they seem to sanction the rule that a contract providing for the payment of commissions to the agent on renewal policies confers upon him no right to collect and retain such commissions after the termination of the agency, or to recover them from the company when collected by another agent.⁷ The question has generally been determined with reference to the peculiar provisions of the particular contract in question.⁸

V. FORFEITURE AND AVOIDANCE — 1. Ground of Forfeiture — a. IN GENERAL. — Contracts of insurance may be forfeited or avoided by the breach or falsity of warranties contained therein or of the representations of the insured which are collateral to the contract.

b. WARRANTIES — (1) Definition. — A warranty is a part of the contract evidenced by the policy, and consists of an assertion of a fact or an undertaking to do a particular act, upon the accuracy or performance of which the validity of the contract depends.⁹

Designation of One as Agent to Accept Process. — When nothing in the original appointment of an agent of an insurance company binds the company to continue the agency for a specified time, the fact that the company, in compliance with a state statute, designated from year to year such person as its agent on whom legal process might be served, does not imply an intention or agreement to continue him as its agent for any special time, and such agency is revocable at will. *Davis v. (2) Kinds of Warranties. — Warranties may be affirmative or promissory.¹ Affirmative warranties may be express or implied, but they usually consist of positive representations in the policy of the existence of some fact or state of things at or previous to the time of making the policy.² Promissory warranties may be express or implied, but they usually have respect to the happening of some future event or the performance of some act in the future.³ The distinction between affirmative and promissory or executory warranties is that the former represent the existence of certain facts at the time when the policy is effected, and the latter represent that certain things shall exist during the continuance of the policy.⁴

(3) Nature of Warranties — (a) In General. — If there is a warranty, the only concern of the courts in the absence of contractual stipulations or statutory enactments to the contrary, is to determine the truth or falsity of the representation warranted.

(b) Materiality — General Rule. — Thus, whether a warranty be affirmative or promissory, the effect of a breach thereof upon the validity of the contract does not depend upon the materiality of the facts warranted; the stipulation of warranty is in effect an agreement that the facts warranted are material to the risk, and precludes any inquiry into the question of materiality.⁵

But it has been held not error to instruct the jury in a suit upon an insurance policy to the effect that if the jurors believe the representation made by the plaintiff to be "essentially" untrue, they should find for the defendant. Hoffman v. Supreme Council, etc., 35 Fed. Rep. 252. Hughes, J., in this case said that the word "essentially" was properly used in the instruction because synonymous with the word "strictly" and not synonymous with the legal term "materially."

Materiality as an Aid to Construction. — While the effect of a warranty is in no wise dependent upon the materiality of the statement, such materiality may sometimes become of import-

Contractual Stipulations as to Materiality. — Where, however, the warranty is that the facts stated are true so far as they are material to the risk, the falsity of one of the statements will invalidate the insurance only in case the fact misstated was material to the risk.¹

Statutory Provisions as to Materiality. — In a number of the United States statutes have been enacted which, while varying considerably in phraseology, provide in effect that the representations and statements of the insured shall not avoid the contract unless material to the risk. These statutes have been held to be remedial in character and within the police power of the state.²

Construction and Effect of Statutes. — Under these statutes a misrepresentation will not, of course, avoid a policy unless it relates to a matter which is material to the risk.³ And it has been held that, unless qualified by words restricting their operation to representations made in good faith, such statutory provisions apply as well to representations fraudulently made as to those made in good faith.⁴ But if the provision of the statute is that misrepresentations or statements made by the insured in good faith shall not avoid the policy unless material to the risk, an immaterial representation will avoid the policy if not made in good faith.⁵ It has been held that under a statute of this kind it is not competent for the parties to conclude for themselves that which the statute in effect declares shall remain open for the court.⁶

ance as an aid to the determination of the question whether the statement is or is not a warranty. Lampkin v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 11 Colo. App. 249.

Where a policy referred to the application, expressly making it "a part of the policy and a warranty by the assured," and then provided that "false representation by the assured of the condition, situation, or occupancy of the property, or any omission to make known any fact material to the risk, or an over-valuation, or any misrepresentation whatever, either in the written application or otherwise, shall render the policy void," it was considered that the effect of these provisions was to make every actual misrepresentation contained in the application a warranty which, if false, should render the policy void, while the mere suppression of or omission to state any fact should have that effect only when the fact suppressed was material to the risk. American Ins. Co. v. Gilbert, 27 Mich. 429.

Under the Massachusetts statute (Acts 1887, c. 214, § 21), in order to avoid a policy for a breach of warranty it must be established not only that the statements or answers were incorrect, but also either that the misrepresentations were made with actual intent to deceive or that the matter misrepresented increased the risk of loss. Levie v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 163 Mass. 117. And it is held that the statute applies not only to statements which are merely representations, but also to warranties incorporated in the policy by a reference to the application. White v. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc., 163 Mass. 108.

But in construing the Kentucky statute of February 4, 1874, providing that "all statements or descriptions in any application for or policies of insurance shall be deemed and held representations, and not warranties," it has been said that this statute would no doubt control in all cases in which the policy is silent as to the effect of such statements and descriptions, but that the parties have a right to de-

(c) Good Faith of Warrantor. — If a warranty is absolute and unqualified, it is immaterial that it was made by the insured in good faith, as where it was made by mistake or through ignorance as to the truth of the matter warranted; the insured will not be permitted to avoid the effect of a breach of his warranty by showing that he acted in good faith.¹ But where the warranty is qualified by the statement that the facts stated are true to the best of the warrantor's knowledge and belief, or by some similar phrase, the falsity of the fact warranted will invalidate the insurance only in case the insured knew or had reason to know that the representation was not true.² If the insured, by fraud or mistake of the agent of the insurer while acting within his authority, is induced to sign a statement which he did not make and did not intend to make, the statement is not only void as to himself, but it will not be sufficient to support a forfeiture of the policy.³

clare in the policy itself the meaning and effect to be given to its stipulations, and there is nothing in the act quoted to indicate an intention on the part of the legislature to control the action of the parties in this respect. *Farmers, etc., Ins. (5) What Constitutes Warranty—(a) In General.—Where a warranty is expressly and in terms declared, there is no room for construction, but the terms of the contract, in this respect, must control.¹ But when not expressly declared to be warranties, it is frequently difficult to determine under what circumstances representations which form a part of the contract of insurance acquire the character of warranties.

(b) Warranties Not Created or Extended by Construction.—In considering the question whether a statement which forms a part of the contract is a warranty, it must be borne in mind, as an established maxim, that warranties are not to be created or extended by construction. They must arise, if at all, from the fair interpretation and clear intendment of the words used by the parties.²

(c) Warranties Not Favored.—And since warranties must be literally fulfilled, they are not favored,³ and the courts, when there is room for construction, invariably manifest a strong reluctance to regard any statement made by the insured as a warranty, unless such was the obvious purpose of the parties to the contract.⁴ If it is doubtful whether statements made by the applicant relative to the subject of insurance are to be regarded as warranties or as representations, they will be deemed representations.⁵

(d) Form or Language of Statements. — While no particular form of words is necessary to create a warranty, the language of a stipulation will sometimes throw light upon its character. Thus, where it appears from the designation of the statements of the insured as "representations" or "statements," or from the form in which they are expressed, that there was no intention to give to them the force and effect of warranties, they will not be so construed.¹ But the language of the statements is not of controlling importance. Statements made by the applicant for insurance may be construed to be representations notwithstanding the fact that they are denominated warranties in the policy, when the language and context of the writings justify the construction.²

Words of Description. — If the terms used in a policy are fully satisfied as a description, they will not be extended to include a warranty unless it is clearly expressed that such was the design and meaning of the parties.³ A phrase which is not a statement of fact at all, but is merely a description of the person to whom the policy is payable, will not be construed as a warranty.⁴ And it has been held that a recital of ownership in a policy of insurance is not such a technical expression as amounts to a warranty.⁵ The effect of a warranty will not be given to words which are merely descriptive of the property insured.⁶ But a phrase, appearing on the face of the policy, which is not merely descriptive of the identity of the property, but relates to the character of the risk, has frequently been held to be a warranty.⁷

(e) Statements Incorporated in Policy. — One general rule in determining whether the particular statement does or does not constitute a warranty is that the warranty must be embraced in the policy itself.⁸ Thus, where warranties are contained in the application, they are always construed as representations, unless by the express provisions of the policy the application is made a part

Where an application apparently stipulated for a warranty, and contained a stipulation that it should form a part of the contract of insurance, but the policy on its face characterized the statements of the assured as representations, the doubt as to whether the representations were intended to be warranties was resolved in favor of the insured. *Moulor v. thereof and the intent is manifest to give the effect of warranties to them.¹ But the statements or agreements of the insured do not necessarily become warranties because they are inserted or referred to in the policy.² The character of the representations of the insured, whether they are contained in the policy itself or in a separate writing referred to in such a manner as to make them a part of the contract, depends upon the language in which they are expressed, the apparent purpose of the insertion or reference, and sometimes upon the connection or relation of other parts of the instrument.³

Statutes Requiring Incorporation of Application in Policy. — In some of the United States it is required by statute that a copy of the application shall be set forth in, indorsed on, or attached to the policy, otherwise a company cannot avail itself of false statements in the application as a defense; and in these states it has accordingly been held that to enable the company to rely upon such statements there must be a compliance with the statute.⁴

(f) Incorporation of Application in Policy — By Express Reference. — The application may be made a part of the contract of insurance, by an express reference in the policy making the application a part of the contract.⁵ Thus it has been

The Massachusetts statute of 1864 (Acts 1864, c. 196) which regulates a form to be used in all fire policies issued by companies chartered or doing business in that state, requires that "the conditions of the insurance shall be stated in the body of the policy, and neither the application of the insured nor the by-laws of the company shall be considered as a warranty or a part of the contract, except so far as they are incorporated in full into the policy and so appear on its face, before the signatures of the officers of the company." Bates's Annot. Stat. Ohio (1897), § 3623, provides that the insurer must return with and as part of any policy issued to the insured a full and complete copy of each application or other document held by the insurer which is intended in any manner to affect the force or validity of the policy. Under this statute it has been held that unless a copy of the application is furnished to the insured with the policy, the application becomes no part of the contract of insurance, and the policy cannot be avoided by representations therein contained. *Andrews v. held that the stipulations in the application amount to an express warranty where the application is referred to in the policy for a more particular description of the property insured and as forming a part of the policy.¹ It is not necessary that the application be physically attached to the policy,² nor is it necessary that the policy state the date of the application.³ But the reference must be such as to make the application in legal effect a part of the policy.⁴ When a reference to the application is expressed to be for a purpose other than to make it a part of the policy, or when no purpose to make it a part of the policy is indicated, it will not have that effect.⁵

Without Express Reference. — An express reference to the application or other writing with a stipulation that it shall form a part of the policy is not invariably necessary. By applying the well-settled and familiar rule that different writings executed at the same time and relating to the same subject-matter will be construed as one instrument, the courts have sometimes treated the application and other writings as part of the contract of insurance though not expressly incorporated in the policy.⁶

into warranties only by being afterwards written into the policy.¹

(6) Construction of Warranties — In General. — A contract of insurance is to be interpreted by the same rules as is any other contract.²

Intention of Parties Controls. — It must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as such intention is ascertainable.³

Parol Evidence in Aid of Construction. — While the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible, parol evidence may, in a proper case, be received for the purpose of enabling the court to interpret the language of the policy and to understand the matter to which it relates and the circumstances under which it was made.⁴

Printed Controlled by Written Parts. — If there is a repugnancy between a written and a printed portion of a policy, the former controls the latter, as being the more deliberate expression of the contracting parties,⁵ without regard to the order of the conflicting parts.⁶

Strictly Construed. — Warranties in contracts of insurance are strictly construed and will not be extended to include anything not necessarily implied in their terms.⁷ When a warranty is that the answers made by the assured to questions are true, the warranty is limited by and cannot be extended beyond the answers given. If an answer is not responsive or satisfactory, the insurer waives a full answer; it cannot be treated as affirming a fact not stated, although called for by the interrogatories.⁸ Thus, if a question is only partially answered, the warranty cannot extend beyond the answer;⁹ and if it is not answered at all there is no warranty that there is nothing to answer;¹⁰ and though there is a warranty that the answers were "in full" and that no material facts were "concealed or withheld," such clause has no application where a question is not answered at all.¹

Construed Most Strongly Against Insurer. — The language of an insurance policy being that of the insurer, it is uniformly held, in accordance with a well-settled rule of construction, that it is to be construed most strongly against the insurer.²

(7) Effect of Breach of Warranty. — Even though an insurance policy may contain no provision that a breach of warranty shall ipso facto nullify the policy or entitle the insurer to claim a forfeiture of the premiums paid, there can be no question that a breach of warranty entitles the insurer to rescind the contract if, after being apprised of the breach, he elects to do so within a reasonable time.³ But since the insurer may waive the breach and treat the contract as binding,⁴ the question arises whether the breach of warranty has the effect upon a policy of this kind of rendering it absolutely void or only voidable at the election of the insurer. It has been held that such a contract is merely voidable, and to constitute a complete defense on the ground of a breach of warranty it must appear that the insurer had claimed and exercised its right within a reasonable time, and that there had been an actual rescission of the contract, or at least that there had been a tender of the premium paid.⁵

But this question is of slight importance, because insurance policies ordinarily contain an express provision that the contract of insurance shall be deemed null and void if the facts warranted to be true are untrue, and stipulate that in that event the sums that have been paid as premiums thereunder shall be forfeited to the insurance company. Where a stipulation of this character is contained in a policy, the right to recover thereon is of course barred by a breach of warranty.¹

Effect of Attempted Rescission of Policy. — The attempted rescission of a contract of insurance by the insurer does not preclude the setting up of the defense of a breach of warranty.²

Effect of Assignment of Policy. — And a policy which is void because of false representations by the insured does not become binding upon the insurer in the hands of a third person to whom it is assigned with the consent of the insurer, but without knowledge of the misrepresentations.³

Effect of Breach on Attempted Revival of Policy. — It has been held that the falsity of declarations or warranties contained in the application for the revival of an insurance policy will prevent the revival of the policy from taking effect.⁴

(8) Breach of Warranties — (a) General Rule. — A warranty must be literally and exactly fulfilled,⁵ and as the insurer has the right to exact of the insured a literal performance, and cannot be compelled to accept a substantial compliance, or to show that the breach was any way material to its interest, so,

Stipulations in Policy Declaring Insurance to Be in Consideration of Representations. — It has sometimes been contended that statements contained in insurance policies that the insurance is in consideration of the representations made to the insurer in the application for the policy are sufficient to give to the representations the character of conditions or warranties. While there is some authority for this view, the general rule is that statements to this effect are not sufficient to change the character of the representations in the application and elevate them to the importance of warranties or conditions of insurance. Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co., 98 Mass. 381; Price v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 17 Minn. 497, 10 Am. Rep. 166; American Popular L. Ins. Co. v. Day, 39 N. J. L. 89.

A warranty that the insured would keep a watchman on the premises was held to be broken where the only watchman provided was a person who slept during the night in a house one thousand feet from the building, visiting it about ten o'clock at night and again on the other hand, the insured is held only to a bare and literal compliance with his engagement, which is not to be extended by construction to include what is not necessarily implied in its terms.¹ In propounding questions to the applicant the insurer is understood to be actuated by an earnest desire to acquire such information as will enable it intelligently to decide as to the desirability of the risk, and if the applicant, when general terms are used in making an inquiry, so interprets it and gives faithful and true answers to the questions as so understood by him, and as really meant by the insurer, he should be held to have spoken truly.² This is especially true where the insurer has used such general terms in framing the questions as to render it impossible or even difficult for the applicant to understand their full scope and meaning.³

(b) Particular Warranties. — A discussion of what amounts to a breach of the different warranties contained in insurance contracts will be found elsewhere in this work,⁴ and only a few illustrations will be given at this place.

Warranty as to Situs of Personal Property. — Policies of insurance, unless the language excludes the presumption, must be presumed to be made with reference to the character of the property insured and to the owner's use of it in the ordinary manner and for the purposes for which such property is ordinarily held and used. Accordingly, where the policy describes the property insured as situated at a specified place, this statement must be interpreted upon this presumption, unless the language is too explicit to admit of such construction. And if the property is of such a description that its real and beneficial enjoyment forbids its being kept at all times in one place, as in the case of horses, carriages, farm machinery, etc., the policy will ordinarily be construed to cover the property when removed from the place where its description has been had at the date of the policy. But if language descriptive of the location of property occurs in the policy upon property which from its character and ordinary use is kept permanently and continuously in one place, such as a stock of merchandise, machinery in a building, household furniture, or things stored, the statement made will limit the risk to the property while in the place contained as described by the policy.⁵

Warranty Against Increase of Risk. — The above-stated presumption is to be applied not only to the clause describing the location of the property, but also at two or three o'clock in the morning. McKenzie v. Scottish Union, etc., Ins. Co., 112 Cal. 548.

An applicant for insurance upon a woolen factory was asked what kind of lamps were used, and whether they were opened or covered. It was held that this question referred to the lamps habitually used, and that there was no misrepresentation in the answer "closed lights," although an open hand lamp was commonly used for the purpose of lighting up. Howard F. Ins. Co. v. Bruner, 23 Pa. St. 50.

Where a fire-insurance policy on buildings in the course of construction contained the words, "Water tanks to be well supplied with water at all times," it was held that this warranty was complied with if at the commencement of the risk the tanks were reasonably advanced towards completion compared with the state of the buildings at that time, and their construction was afterwards continued with reasonable dispatch until the time of the fire. Gloucester Mfg. Co. v. Howard F. Ins. Co., 5 Gray (Mass.) 497, 66 Am. Dec. 376.

5. Warranty as to Situs of Personal Property. — Holbrook v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 25 Minn. 229.

In Everett v. Continental Ins. Co., 21 Minn. 76, a clause which stated that the property insured (a threshing machine) was "stored in barn on Sec. 36, T. 23, R. 28, owned and insured by L. L. Chaffin," was held to be a mere matter of description operating to identify the property, and not a promissory stipulation on the part of the insured nor a condition of insurance on the part of the insurer that the location mentioned must remain unchanged, or that if changed the insurance should cease or be suspended.

to the condition in reference to the increase of risk which is incident to the ordinary use of a particular kind of property which is insured, and such increased risk cannot be held to vitiate a contract of insurance.¹

Warranty of Ownership. — An equitable title is sufficient to support a warranty that the interest of the insured is the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership of the property.² And the fact that the widow of a former owner had a contingent right of dower in the property has been held not to amount to a breach of a warranty by the insured that he was the owner in fee simple.³

Warranty Against Incumbrances. — A warranty that there are no incumbrances upon the property insured is, of course, broken by the existence of a valid mortgage upon the property.⁴ It makes no difference that the mortgage not disclosed was given without consideration, and might be avoided by creditors and bona fide purchasers if binding between the parties.⁵ But to have this effect, the incumbrance must be a valid subsisting lien upon the property insured.⁶ Thus, the fact that a mortgage which has been paid is not discharged of record does not amount to a breach of the warranty.⁷

Warranty Against Alienation of Property. — Where the insurance policy contains a provision that it shall cease to be in force if a change shall take place in the title of the insured without the consent of the insurer, a violation of such provision by the insured terminates the contract of insurance.⁸ But it has been held that a policy which contains a clause prohibiting any transfer of the interest of the insured without the consent of the insurer is not rendered void by a mortgage of the property;⁹ nor by a sale and conveyance, the grantee having simultaneously reconveyed to the grantor in mortgage;¹⁰ nor by a conveyance in trust to pay the grantor's creditors where the grantor retains possession;¹¹ nor by a conditional sale;¹² nor by a contract to sell and

Where there was a policy of insurance on a stock of merchandise "such as is usually kept in country stores," it was held that the policy covered a stock of gasoline if that was an article usually kept in country stores, and if such was the effect of the policy the insurance was not invalidated by reason of the fact that the insured kept gasoline upon the premises as a part of the stock of merchandise. *Yoch v. It was provided in a contract of insurance that if the property should be encumbered the policy should be void, unless the true title of the assured and the incumbrance were expressed therein. The applicant for insurance stated that the property was encumbered, but did not state the amount. It was held that this was a sufficient compliance with the condition as to the statement of the incumbrance. Bersche v. St. Louis Mut. F. & M. Ins. Co., 31 Mo. 555.

convey at a future day, the purchaser agreeing on that day to pay a certain sum and secure the residue of the money;¹ nor by a sale under execution while the assured has the right to redeem, at least in the absence of proof that such right is of no-value.² And where more than one building is insured separately by the same policy, the alienation of one of the buildings does not, it has been held, avoid the policy as to the others.³

Warranty to Give Notice of Incumbrances. — A stipulation in a policy of insurance requiring the insured to notify the insurer of any incumbrances or liens to which the property may become subject, and to obtain its consent thereto, is a substantive and material part of the contract, and is avoided by a failure of the insured to give the prescribed notice.⁴

Warranty Describing Property. — A warranty describing the property insured is, of course, broken if there is a misdescription with respect to the manner in which it is used,⁵ its situation with respect to other property,⁶ or otherwise.⁷

c. REPRESENTATIONS — (1) Definition. — A representation in insurance is a statement in regard to a material fact made by the applicant for insurance to the insurer with reference to a proposed contract of insurance.⁸

(2) Falsity of Representations. — It is held that a material misrepresentation defeats a contract of insurance without any express provision to that effect in the policy;⁹ but in order to have this effect, the representation must be materially untrue, or untrue in some particular material to the risk.¹⁰ It has been held that if a representation relating to a material matter is substantially true — that is to say, if it is so far true that the conduct of the insurer would not have been different if it had known the exact truth — this will not vitiate the policy.¹¹ And it has been held that a substantial compliance with a promissory representation is all that is required to entitle the insured to recover upon his policy.¹²

An applicant for fire insurance warranted that no building save dwelling houses was within eight rods of the one to be insured. In the action upon the insurance policy it was contended by the defendant that at the time of the insurance a carpenter shop stood directly in the rear of the house insured and in very close proximity thereto. It was held that if this was so, there was a breach of the warranty. Pottsville Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Horan, 89 Pa. St. 438.

7. Misdescription Generally. — Where the building upon which a fire-insurance policy was issued was described in the policy as a stone dwelling house, it was held that the fact that the kitchen attached to the building was a wooden structure amounted to a breach of the warranty. Chase v. Hamilton Ins. Co., 20 N. Y. 52.

A warranty describing the building insured as two stories high was held not to be broken by reason of the fact that the building, the main part of which was two stories high, had a small one-story addition in the rear. The court said: "The building was, in fact, a two-story building. It would, we think, be usually so denominated, notwithstanding the one-story rear addition. The description in regard to height pertained, as it appears to us, rather to identification than the character of the risk; and where this is so, not quite the same accuracy is required." Wilkins v. Germania F. Ins. Co., 57 Iowa 529.

12. Promissory Representations — Substantial

(3) Representations to Avoid Policy Must Be Material. — Ordinarily, a false representation, unlike a warranty, to have the effect of avoiding a policy, must be material to the risk.¹ But a representation may, of course, be made material by the agreement of the parties,² as where it is stipulated that the policy shall be void in the case of any misrepresentation whatever.³ It has been held, however, that even if by the terms of the policy it is made an express condition of the contract that if the representations contained therein are found to be untrue the policy shall be null and void, this does not alter the character and constitute them warranties, though the effect of the stipulation may be to make them conclusively material.⁴

(4) Good Faith of Insured Immaterial. — But if a representation is false in substance and material to the risk, there can be no liability upon the policy, however innocently the misrepresentation may have been made; whether made fraudulently or by mistake or accident, the effect is the same.⁵

(5) Materiality of Representations — (a) General Rule. — Every fact untruly asserted or wrongfully suppressed must be regarded as material if the knowledge or ignorance of it would naturally influence the judgment of the underwriter in making the contract at all, or in estimating the degree and character of the risk, or in fixing the rate of premium. If the fact so untruly stated or purposely suppressed is not of this character, it is not material.⁶

(b) Materiality Question of Fact. — The materiality of a representation is ordinarily a question of fact to be found by the jury, like any other fact, upon all the facts and circumstances of the particular case,¹ unless the parties have, by the terms of the contract, conclusively agreed to consider the representations material, in which event the question of materiality cannot be left to the jury.²

2. Waiver and Estoppel — a. GENERAL STATEMENT. — Since the conditions of a policy a breach of which by the assured will give rise to a forfeiture are inserted for the benefit of the insurance company, they may be waived either pending the negotiation for the insurance or after such negotiation has been completed and during the currency of the policy, and this either before or after the forfeiture is incurred.³ And since forfeitures are not favored in the law, the courts are always prompt to seize hold of any circumstances that indicate an election to waive.⁴

waive may be inferred or from which a waiver follows as a legal result.¹

Waiver and Estoppel Interchangeable Terms. — In many of the decisions attempted distinctions have been made between a waiver and an estoppel, it being contended that an implied waiver may arise from acts or conduct on the part of the insurer which do not create a technical estoppel.² But it seems to be the prevailing opinion that the doctrine of waiver as asserted against insurance companies to avoid the strict enforcement of conditions contained in their policies is only another name for the doctrine of estoppel,³ and the terms will be used interchangeably in the following discussion.

Parol Waiver. — As a general rule any condition of a contract of insurance may be waived by parol by the insurance company, since the contract of insurance is not within the statute of frauds and may be by parol.⁴ And this rule applies notwithstanding stipulations in the policy that nothing less than an express agreement indorsed on the policy shall be effectual for that purpose, since such a stipulation is itself a condition and is as capable of being waived or dispensed with as any other condition of the instrument, and since parties to contracts cannot so tie their wills as to be unable thereafter to do by consent what the law allows.⁵

(2) Issuance of Policy Without Objection to Known Grounds of Forfeiture —

(a) In General. — An insurance company will not be permitted to defeat a recovery upon a policy issued by it proving the existence of facts which, by the terms of the policy, would render it void, where at the issuance of the policy the company had full knowledge of such facts,⁶ or information which, if pur-where an express waiver is relied on there must be evidence that the subject-matter of the waiver and consent was in the minds of the parties at the time.

1. Waiver Inferred from Acts. — Hartford L. Annuity Ins. Co. v. Unsell, 144 U. S. 449; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 234; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Eggleston, 96 U. Glens Falls Ins. Co.*, 81 N. Y. 419.

2. Implied Waiver Not Technical Estoppel. — Queen Ins. Co. v. Young, 86 Ala. 431, 11 Am. St. Rep. 51; Hollis v. State Ins. Co., 65 Iowa 459; *Billings v. German Ins. Y. 418; Kiernan v. Dutchess County Mut. Ins. Co., 150 N. Y. 195.

In New York, where this view has been expressed, it has been said, however, in some recent decisions that in the absence of an express waiver some of the elements of an estoppel must appear. *Armstrong v. sued, would have led to actual knowledge.¹ Especially is this true if notice of the facts is incorporated in the application upon which the policy is based.² In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that the fact that the insured knew of a breach of condition of the policy at the time when a contract of insurance was issued will not amount to a waiver, since the effect would be to vary a written contract by parol.³

(b) Effect of Constructive Knowledge. — But it seems that the knowledge which is contemplated by this rule is actual and not constructive knowledge.⁴ Thus the fact that the title of the risk insured is of record at the time when the policy is issued will not be notice to the insurer of the state of the title.⁵

Effect of Fraudulent Representation in Application. — It has been held that receiving the premium and issuing the policy with full knowledge of all the facts by the insurer will create an estoppel to rely on such facts as a forfeiture though the assured made a false representation as to the facts in his application. Standard L., etc., Ins. Co. v. Davis, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 45 S. W. Rep. 826.

authorities the insurer may waive a forfeiture called for by the terms of the policy by reason of facts existing at the time when the contract is made, apart from any actual knowledge on its part at the time, where there was no written application and where no question was asked and no statements were made in regard to such facts, and the insured had no knowledge that such facts were material to the risk.¹ But a contrary view has been adopted by other authorities, the contention being that there is no duty on the part of the insurer to make inquiry as to the facts.²

(d) Omission or Imperfect Answer Appearing on Face of Application. — Where it appears upon the face of an application for insurance that a question is not answered at all or is imperfectly answered, the issuance of a policy without further inquiry will constitute a waiver of the imperfection in the application and will render immaterial the omission to give a fuller answer.³

(3) Acts After Issuance of Policy but Prior to Forfeiture. — Where the conduct of the insurer before the forfeiture occurs is such as fairly to induce the assured to believe that a requirement or condition of the policy will not be insisted on, such requirement or condition will be regarded as waived.⁴

Assertion of Specific Breach. — Sometimes the denial of liability for a specified ground of forfeiture operates as a waiver of a subsequent ground.⁵ This doctrine has been applied where the company has, by placing its nonliability on one ground, led the assured to believe that a compliance with other conditions will be unavailing.⁶ Thus it seems to be a well-established rule that where an insurance company refuses to pay a loss, placing its refusal upon a definite ground other than the want of preliminary proofs of loss or a defect in their form or substance, it waives the right to insist upon the failure to make the requisite proof as a defense to an action on the policy.⁷ And it has been held that by demanding compliance with one stipulation the insurer waives the right to insist upon the performance of another, the enforcement of which would be inconsistent with the prior demand, as where the company demands proofs of loss, the production of which consumes the time within which suit was to be brought under a requirement of the policy.¹

(4) Conduct After Forfeiture — (a) In General. — And even after the forfeiture occurs the insurer is precluded from taking advantage thereof if, with full knowledge of the facts out of which the forfeiture arose, it neglects to declare its intention of insisting on the forfeiture, or by its acts recognizes and treats the policy as a valid and subsisting contract, and induces the assured to act in that belief, especially if such acts cause the assured to incur trouble or expense.²

Payment of Dividend. — In Combs v. Shrewsbury Mut. F. Ins. Co., 34 N. J. Eq. 403, it was held that the payment of a dividend to the assured after knowledge of the forfeiture was a waiver.

Subsequent Change in Form of Policy. — In the same way it has been held that if an insurance company with knowledge of a forfeiture makes a change in the form of a policy at the request of the assured, and returns the policy as one of binding obligation, the forfeiture is waived. American F. Ins. Co. v. Vicksburg First Nat. Bank, 73 Miss. 469.

Taking Additional Risk on Same Policy. — So it has been held that the taking of additional risk on the same policy with knowledge of a forfeiture will waive the forfeiture. Rathbone v. City F. Ins. Co., 31 Conn. 193. See also Viele v. Germania Ins. Co., 26 Iowa 55, 96 Am. Dec. 83.

And the same rule has been applied where an agent with knowledge of a forfeiture took risks on the property insured in other companies represented by him. Crescent Ins. Co. v. Griffin, 59 Tex. 509.

Consent to Assignment. — Also it has been held that if an insurance company with knowledge of a forfeiture subsequently consents to an assignment of the policy, the forfeiture is waived. Rockford Ins. Co. v. Williams, 56 Ill. App. 341; Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 56 Pa. St. 257, 94 Am. Dec. 65.

But a different rule has been laid down where by the terms of the consent to the transfer the transferred policy was subject to the same terms and conditions as when it was first issued. Insurance Co. of North America v. Garland, 108 Ill. 227. See also Barnes v. Union Mut. F. Ins. Co., 45 N. H. 21.

The Assignment of One Ground of Forfeiture Only as a reason for refusal to pay has been Conduct Relied on as Forfeiture Not Intended nor Understood as Such. — But there is no waiver where the conduct relied on to constitute a waiver is accompanied by other acts showing that it was not the intention of the insured to waive the forfeiture, and that the insured so understood it, as where the insurer at the time disclaimed liability on the policy.¹

Knowledge Necessary. — To make any act of the insurer the waiver of a breach of a condition for which he may elect to treat the policy as void, it must be with notice of the breach.² And the fact that the insurer waived one ground of forfeiture of which he was informed will not be an implied waiver of another ground of which he had no knowledge.³

Failure of Knowledge to Restore Insured to Former Status. — But an act done in recognition of the validity of a policy, in ignorance of the fact that it is subject to forfeiture, will be ratified and will constitute a waiver by a failure, after knowledge of the facts is acquired, to restore promptly that which was obtained by virtue of the policy and to place the assured in his former position.⁴

(b) Mere Silence or Nonaction. — In a number of cases the view has been expressed that in case of a breach of a condition of a policy the company is not bound at its peril, upon notice of such breach, to declare the policy forfeited, or to do or say anything to make the forfeiture effectual; that a waiver cannot be inferred from the insurer's mere silence or nonaction; and that it may wait until claim is made under the policy and then allege the forfeiture in denial thereof or in defense of a suit commenced therefor.⁵ But this rule does not held to operate as a waiver of another ground, where the assured has thereby been reasonably induced to incur trouble or expense in making proofs or otherwise which he would not have incurred if the other ground had been originally insisted on. *Towle v. apply where by the terms of the policy some further action on the part of the insurer is required after notice of the facts.¹ Also it has been held that failure of the insurer to object on notice of intention to violate one of the conditions of a policy will amount to a waiver, as the silence of the insurer will be deemed to have induced the breach of the condition.² But a different rule has been applied when such notice was communicated casually and not in a manner implying a request for permission to disregard a condition of the policy.³

(c) Acceptance of Payment of Premium. — If an insurer accepts or enforces payment of a premium or assessment after knowledge that there has been a breach of a condition or warranty, the acceptance of the premium is a waiver of the right to avoid the policy for that breach, since to hold otherwise would be to maintain that the contract of insurance requires good faith of the insured only and not of the insurer.⁴

Retention of Premium After Knowledge of Breach. — In the same way the retention of an unearned premium after knowledge of the breach of a condition of the policy will amount to a waiver of the breach, though the insurer did not have notice of the breach at the time when the premium was collected. Faker v. New York L. Ins. Co., 77 Fed. Rep. 550; Williamsburg City F. Ins. Co. v. Cary, 83 Ill. 456; Home Ins. Co. v. Marple, 1 Ind. App. 411; Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Dole, 20 Ind. But where the insurance company orders the return of the premium and the cancellation of the policy as soon as it is informed of the breach, there is no waiver. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wolff, 95 U. S. 332; John R. Davis Lumber Co. v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 95 Wis. 226.

Nor is there a waiver if a tender is made within a reasonable time after knowledge of the forfeiture. Green v. Northwestern Live Stock Ins. Co., 87 Iowa 358.

Deposit of Premium in Court. — Under statute

Insured Must Understand Payment as Waiver. — But the mere act of receiving or collecting the premium by the insurance company with knowledge of an existing right of forfeiture will not estop the company from setting up the forfeiture unless the assured paid the premium under the belief, fairly induced by the acts or declarations of the company or its agents, that the payment would operate as a waiver or estoppel.¹ Hence if, at the time when the payment of a premium is made to the insurer having knowledge of a forfeiture, the insurer is informed that the company intends to insist on the forfeiture, no waiver will arise.²

Where the Premium Is Earned Before the Forfeiture the subsequent taking and retaining the premium are not inconsistent with a defense based upon such forfeiture, and will not amount to a waiver.³

A Mere Demand for Payment Which Is Refused by the insured will not amount to a waiver.⁴

(d) Requiring Proofs of Loss. — Where an insurer, after full knowledge of a forfeiture, calls for proofs of loss or otherwise negotiates with the insured with reference to the adjustment of the loss, whereby the insured is put to trouble and expense, the insurer thereby recognizes the continued validity of the policy and cannot afterward change its ground and claim that the policy is no longer in force.⁵ And this is especially true where not only first proofs but additional proofs are required.⁶

But a Distinction Has Been Drawn by Some of the Authorities in cases where by the

in Missouri it has been held that where, by the terms of the policy, the amount of the insurance was subject to correction for a misstatement as to the age of the insured, a misrepresentation by the insured as to her age was no defense in an action on the policy where the defendant failed at or before the trial to deposit in court, for the benefit of the plaintiff, the premiums recovered on the policy. Floyd v. Prudential Ins. Co., 72 Mo. App. 455.

Effect of Prior Conditional Waiver. — An unconditional acceptance of an assessment waives all former known grounds of forfeiture, and this effect is not varied or limited because an acceptance of a former assessment had been on condition and had not amounted to such a waiver. Rice v. New England Mut. Aid Soc., 146 Mass. 251. See also Williams v. Maine State Relief Assoc., 89 Me. 164.

Premium Collected by Mistake of Fact After Disclaimer of Liability. — In Ryan v. Rockford Ins. Co., 85 Wis. 573, it was held that there was no waiver when, after an insurance company had denied all liability on a policy on account of a forfeiture, a clerk of the company, in ignorance of the facts and without the direction or knowledge of any person having authority to bind the company, though in the regular course of business, collected a premium from the insured, which the company at once tendered back.

ance company on the premium note of a policy holder with knowledge of the forfeiture of the policy, and the collection of such assessment made to pay losses sustained by the company before the forfeiture, do not constitute a waiver of the forfeiture although such assessment was in excess of what was actually necessary to pay such losses. *Farmers' Mut. terms of the policy the insured is required to furnish proofs of loss, and until he does so he has no cause of action, the contention being that the requirement by the insurer that the insured should perform his contract obligation does not estop the insurer from insisting on other conditions of the policy.¹ Nor, it is held, does the rule apply where the insurer is entitled to call for proofs for some special reason not inconsistent with an insistence upon the forfeiture of the policy.² Thus where the insurer is entitled by the terms of the policy to have proofs of loss submitted for the purpose, among other things, of getting information as to facts creating a forfeiture, the acceptance of proofs by which such information is imparted will not amount to a waiver of the forfeiture though it appears that the insured was notified, though not fully, from another source.³ And a demand by the insurer that the insured shall produce his books and make proofs of loss in accordance with the terms of the policy is not a waiver of any condition in the policy.⁴ It seems to be settled, also, that the rule does not apply when the communication inviting proofs of loss apprises the insured of the fact that the insurer will insist on the forfeiture.⁵

c. BY WHOM WAIVER MAY BE MADE — (1) President or Vice-President of Company. — Facts communicated to or waivers by the president⁶ or vice-president⁷ of the company have been held to be binding on the company.

(2) Secretary. — And the same has been held of waivers by the secretary⁸ or assistant secretary⁹ of the company.

(3) Agents — (a) In General. — The difficulty in nearly all cases where a waiver is alleged, in the absence of written proof of the fact, arises from a consideration of the effect to be given to the acts of agents of the company in their dealings with the assured. In order that the acts of such agents may effect a waiver binding upon the company, they must, of course, have authority to waive a compliance with the conditions upon a breach of which the forfeiture is claimed, or to waive the forfeiture when incurred, or their acts waiving such compliance or forfeiture must be subsequently approved by the company. The law of agency is the same whether it be applied to the act of an agent undertaking to continue a policy of insurance or to any other act for which it is sought to hold his principal responsible.¹⁰

(b) General Agent. — It may be laid down as a general rule that an agent with general authority, i. e., an agent who is authorized to take risks and enter into contracts of insurance without consulting the company, may waive any of the conditions contained in the policy, and his knowledge of facts material to the risk is the knowledge of the company.¹

Issuance of Policy with Knowledge of Existing Ground of Forfeiture. — Thus if he issues a policy and accepts the premium with knowledge of existing facts which, by the terms of the policy, will render it voidable, the company will, in the absence of any showing of collusion between the agent and the assured, be estopped to set up a forfeiture.²

Waiver of Conditions to Be Performed in Future. — But it has been held that a general agent may not, by his acts or representations at the time of effecting the contract of insurance, waive conditions in the policy relating to future action.³

Waiver After Issuance of Policy. — As a general rule a general agent may waive a forfeiture after the issuance of the policy, and the company is chargeable with his knowledge of facts material to the risk coming to his knowledge after the policy is issued.⁴

(c) Soliciting Agent — aa. IN GENERAL — Waiver at Time of Issuance of Policy. — Where an insurance company transacts business through an agent having authority to solicit, make out, and forward applications for insurance, to deliver policies when executed, and to collect and transmit premiums, notice given to such agent when engaged in procuring an application will operate as notice to the company, and the company may be estopped by acts done by the agent in respect to the business which he is transacting, in the absence of evidence to show that special limitations upon his powers were known to the insured or were plainly to be inferred from the nature of the employment.⁵

Waiver of Conditions as to Future Conduct. — But by a number of authorities it has been held that a soliciting agent may not, at or before the issuance of the policy, waive conditions in the policy relating to future acts or defaults, on the ground that all verbal arrangements at that time are merged in the written agreement, and further that an estoppel cannot arise from a promise as to future action with respect to a right to be acquired upon an agreement not yet made.¹ It has been held, however, that where an agent, acting in the real or apparent scope of his authority, though he may not have authority to issue a policy, makes a preliminary oral contract of insurance to the effect that a policy shall thereafter be made out by the defendant company at its home office, and the company afterwards refuses to issue the policy, it cannot set up in defense of an action on such preliminary oral contract conduct of the assured subsequent to the contract to which the agent consented at the time when the contract was made.²

Waiver After Issuance of Policy. — And it has been held that the authority of a mere soliciting agent as to the particular policy ceases as soon as the contract is complete, and he has no power thereafter to waive any of the conditions of the policy.³ So it has been held that where an agent has power only to take applications and deliver policies, his knowledge of facts subsequent to the Knowledge that Assured Is Arranging for Other Insurance. — In Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. F. Assoc., 103 Iowa 280, knowledge by a soliciting agent at the time when the application was made, that the assured was arranging for additional insurance and had definitely fixed the amount, was held to be binding on the company, on the ground that it was knowledge of a condition of things then existing. issuance of the policy is not imputable to the company so as to estop it from insisting on a forfeiture.¹ Thus, notice to a soliciting agent of a forfeiture by reason of additional insurance after the issuance of the policy will not be binding on the company.²

bb. INSERTION OF FALSE STATEMENTS IN APPLICATION. — In the absence of a limitation of the agent's authority made known to the applicant by the terms of the application or otherwise at the time of taking it, the prevailing rule is that the insurer, after accepting the premium and issuing the policy, will be estopped to set up in avoidance of the policy false or misleading statements or omissions in the application, made, whether wilfully or by mistake, by the duly authorized soliciting agent, and without fraud or collusion by the applicant.³ The ground of these decisions is that the recitals in the application are not, when viewed in the light of the evidence offered, the representation of the applicant, but the statements of the insurer himself.⁴

Applicant's Ignorance of False Statements. — This rule is applied where the applicant has no knowledge of the false statements,¹ as where he is unable to read and write,² or, indeed, though he can read and write, if he signed the application without reading it or having it read to him.³ The rule has been applied also where the application was not signed by the applicant,⁴ or where the false statement was inserted after it was signed.⁵

Where the Agent, on His Own Responsibility, Writes an Answer, though with the Knowledge and Assent of the Applicant, the insurer will, it has been held, be estopped to claim a forfeiture if the applicant relied in good faith on the assurance of the agent that this was the proper answer to be made.⁶

Misstatements as to Subject of Insurance. — But it has been held that the principle which relieves the party insured from responsibility for unauthorized representations made by the soliciting agent of the insurer in respect to some incident to the risk, and permits them to be disregarded in an action to enforce the contract, has no application where the point in issue is as to the subject of insurance and the contract is explicit on that point; and hence, that if the contract relates to one definite and distinct subject, it cannot be turned into a contract for the insurance of another and a different subject on proof that the agent of the company, by mistake, described the wrong property in his application.⁷

Effect of Stipulation in Application that Insurer Shall Be Bound by Written Statements Only. — The above rule has been held not to apply where the authority of the agent taking the application is limited by a provision in the application that no verbal statements made to the agent shall be binding on the company or in any way affect its rights.⁸ But the insurer can take advantage of no such limitation of authority in the face of a statute which substantially provides that the person procuring an application for insurance shall be regarded as the agent of the company, but not of the insured, notwithstanding a provision in the application to the contrary.¹

Provision that Solicitor Shall Be Agent of Applicant. — And it has been held that if the stipulation in the application is broad enough to constitute the person writing the application the agent of the insured, he will be bound thereby in accordance with its terms.²

Where There Is Fraud or Collusion. — The company is not bound by the statements contained in an application when not only the agent but the insured knows that they are untrue and calculated to deceive, and the application is to be forwarded to the company as the basis of its action, if the company, upon learning the situation, refuses to ratify the transaction, as by returning the premium and denying any liability under the policy.³ But under statute in Ohio it has been held that collusion by the applicant and the agent in furnishing false answers will not defeat a recovery on the policy.⁴

Burden of Proof. — It has been held that the burden of proof will be on the applicant to show that the false statements were inserted in the application without his knowledge.⁵

(a) Adjuster. — An adjuster, not being ipso facto a general agent, but a special agent of limited authority, has been held to have no power as a matter of law to waive any of the essential conditions of a policy of insurance; and when his acts, if authorized, would amount to a waiver, it must be shown that they were authorized by the company before it can be held bound thereby.⁶ But since the business of an adjuster is to ascertain the loss and agree with the assured on a settlement, it seems to be the rule that he has authority to waive all matters of form or detail, such as preliminary proofs of loss, connected with his business,⁷ and this is especially true where there is evidence other than his mere title of adjuster, of his authority to receive proofs of the loss in question and settle them.⁸

Waiver of Requirement for Action in Specified Time. — Also it has been held that the power of an adjuster to insist on proofs of loss necessarily involves authority to waive a requirement that the action on the policy shall be brought within a specified time, where the demand for proofs is inconsistent with the provision limiting the right of action.⁹

(e) Collector. — It seems that a mere collector of premiums has not, as a general rule, power to waive any of the conditions of a policy in the absence of proof of special authority to make waivers.¹

(f) Effect of Agent's Knowledge Acquired Outside of Agency. — It may be stated as a general proposition that an insurance company will not be chargeable with notice of facts material to the risk at the time of the issuance of the policy, merely because an agent had previously acquired knowledge of such facts in the course of an employment in no way relating to the agency and with which the insurance company was not connected.²

Where Knowledge Not Acquired in Confidential Relation, and Parties at Arm's Length. — But when, in effecting the contract of insurance, the assured and the agent of the insurer are dealing at arm's length, the agent is charged on behalf of the insurer with notice of any facts material to the risk of which he may have knowledge, though such knowledge was acquired outside of his agency, if it was not communicated to him with respect to some matter springing out of a confidential relation, and if the circumstances are such as to justify the inference that the agent had the facts in mind at the time when the policy was issued.³

Notice After Issuance of Policy. — Notice to a general agent after the issuance of the policy will be notice to the insurance company though the information was acquired in a capacity other than as the agent of the insurance company.⁴

Knowledge Acquired as Agent of Other Insurer. — Thus, under a policy providing for a forfeiture on account of other insurance it has been held that knowledge acquired by a general agent after the issuance of the policy as the agent of another company in procuring the insurance will be imputed to the company.⁵

(g) Limitations of Authority — aa. IN GENERAL. — The authority of an insurance agent may, of course, as in the case of any other agent, be limited by his principal, but his powers are coextensive with the business intrusted to his care and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals.⁶ But if knowledge of the agent's limitation of authority is brought home to the assured, he will be bound thereby.⁷

bb. LIMITATIONS ON FACE OF POLICY — (aa) In General. — It is usual for insurance companies to insert in their policies clauses by which the powers of their agents are restricted or sought to be restricted.

(bb) Clauses Prohibiting Waiver by Agents — Effect on Agent's Authority At or Before Issuance of Policy. — It seems to be the prevailing doctrine that the rule holding the company chargeable with the acts, declarations, or knowledge of facts of a general or soliciting agent at or before the issuance of the policy, is not affected by clauses in the policy prohibiting waivers by agents or stipulating that the agent shall be the agent of the assured, where it is not shown that such limitations were brought to the knowledge of the assured.⁸

Effect on Agent's Authority After Issuance of Policy — Soliciting Agent. — But as a general rule a stipulation in a policy prohibiting a waiver of any condition therein by a mere soliciting agent after the issuance of the policy, as where the power to waive is limited to some specified officer of the company, such as the president or secretary, will be binding upon the assured, since in such case he will be presumed to take notice of the limitations on the face of the policy.¹

General Agent. — And in some jurisdictions it is held that where the policy declares that a general agent shall have no power to waive any of the conditions therein after the issuance of the policy, or that only certain officers among whom he is not included shall have such power, such limitation will be binding on the assured.² But according to another view any attempted restriction of this kind upon a general agent is ineffectual, especially in the case of a foreign insurance company whose officers are practically inaccessible to the assured.³

(cc) Limitations as to Mode of Waiver — aaa. Effect on Agent's Authority At or Before Issuance of Policy. — The restrictions inserted in the policy upon the power of the agent to waive any condition unless in a particular manner, as by indorsing the waiver on the policy, cannot be deemed to apply to those conditions which relate to the inception of the contract, when it appears that the agent has delivered it and received the premium with full knowledge of the actual situation. This doctrine has been applied to both general and mere soliciting agents.⁴ But by some of the authorities it has been held that the company will not be estopped to insist upon a compliance with such stipulations in the policy merely because at the time of the issuance of the policy the agent knew of an intention on the part of the insured to violate conditions of the policy, as that he intended subsequently to procure additional insurance.¹

bbb. Effect on Agent's Authority After Issuance of Policy. — Considerable discussion has arisen as to the effect on the authority of the insurance agent after the issuance of the policy, of various provisions in policies requiring in effect that a waiver of a condition be indorsed on the policy. The general rule which seems to be sanctioned by the weight of authority is that where an agent is intrusted with power to waive a condition in a policy by indorsement or in writing, he may also make a parol waiver notwithstanding a provision in the policy requiring that the waiver shall be indorsed on or attached to the policy.² Under this rule it has been held that a general agent may make a verbal waiver.³ And especially is this true where a general agent having authority to indorse a waiver has promised to make the indorsement, but without any fault of the insured has failed to do so.⁴

4. Failure to Indorse Not Chargeable to Insured. — Dupuy v. Delaware Ins. Co., 63 Fed. Rep. 680; Manchester v. Guardian Assur. Co., 151 N. Y. 88, 56 Am. St. Rep. 600 [distinguishing Baumgartel v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co., 136 N. Y. 547]; Morrison v. Insurance Co. of North America, 69 Tex. 353, 5 Am. St. Rep. 63; West v. Norwich Union F. McCrea, 8 Lea (Tenn.) 513, 41 Am. Rep. 647.

But where the promise is to indorse when the policy is produced, and the assured does not produce the policy, there is no waiver. Connecticut F. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 10 Colo. App. 121; Baumgartel v. Providence-Washington Ins. Co., 136 N. Y. 547; Tompkins v.

Verbal Consent of Soliciting Agent Where Policy Requires Writing. — But the fact that an agent merely had authority to solicit insurance, receive and write applications for insurance, and forward such applications to the general agent of the company, will not confer on him power to waive orally a condition when the policy requires the written consent of the company to the waiver.¹ And the same has been held of a person employed by an insurance agent to do mere clerical work.²

Prohibition of Parol Waiver by Officers and Agents Generally. — The question here under discussion has arisen frequently in the later decisions in determining the validity and effect of a stipulation in the policy to the effect that no officer, agent, or other representative of the insurance company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of the policy unless such waiver is indorsed on the policy. According to some of the authorities such a provision is inoperative, for the reason that as a corporation can act only through its officers or agents, the provision practically precludes one of the parties to a written contract which is not required by law to be in writing, from subsequently waiving by parol agreement conditions which had been incorporated in the contract for his benefit.³ But by other authorities it is held that a provision of this character is valid⁴ and may restrict the authority of a general agent,⁵ and it is immaterial whether the insured read the policy or not, or had actually acknowledged all the conditions or limitations of the power of the agent.⁶

Under Statute Adopting Standard Form of Policy. — This latter view is now supported in some jurisdictions under statutes adopting a standard policy the use of which is made compulsory and in which the provision in question or a similar provision is incorporated.⁷

(dd) Application of Limitations to Waiver of Conditions to Be Performed After Loss. — The rule has been laid down in a number of jurisdictions that a stipulation in a policy limiting the power of agents to waive forfeitures or restricting them as to the mode of waiver, such as the provision that no officer, agent, or representative of the company shall be held to waive any of the terms or conditions of the policy unless such waiver shall be indorsed thereon in writing, applies only to those conditions and proofs in the policy which relate to the formation and continuance of the contract of insurance and are essential to the binding force of the contract while it is running, and does not apply to those conditions which are to be performed after the loss has occurred, such as giving notice and furnishing preliminary proof of the loss.¹

VI. LIABILITY FOR PREMIUMS — 1. Liability of Assured for Premiums —

a. WHEN POLICY IS VOID. — If an insurance policy is void for want of some element essential to the creation of a valid contract, or for breach of some condition precedent, a note given for the premium is also void for want of a valuable consideration.²

When Insurance Is Induced by Fraud. — So if a person is induced by the fraudulent representations of the agent to take out insurance upon his property, the insured may, after offering to return the policy to the insurer and his refusal to accept it, set up the facts as a defense to an action upon his premium note.³

b. WHEN POLICY DOES NOT CONFORM TO APPLICATION. — If a person applies for a policy of insurance and gives his note for the premium, he has a reasonable time after the receipt of the policy within which to discover that it does not conform to his application, and to object to and return it. If the policy is not of the sort contracted for, and the applicant offers to return it,

2. No Liability upon Premium Note When Policy Is Void. — Bersch v. Sinnissippi Ins. Co., 28 Ind. 64.

An applicant for insurance will not be liable upon his promissory note given for the first instalment of the premium if the contract is invalid on account of a provision in it rendering it inoperative until the premium is actually paid in cash. Dunham v. Morse, 158 Mass. 132, 35 Am. St. Rep. 473.

3. When Insured Is Induced to Take Policy by Fraud. — Rockford Ins. Co. v. Hildreth, 45 Ill. App. 428.

What Is Not Fraud. — A mistake by the assured as to the character of the instrument he was signing, no fraud or deception being alleged or shown, is not sufficient to relieve him from the obligation imposed by the premium note as a part of the contract of insurance. Palmer v. Continental Ins. Co., 31 Mo. App. 467.

A statement by an insurance agent that the first premium upon a policy would be two hundred and thirteen dollars, when in fact it was two hundred and twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, is not such a misrepresentation as will render void a promissory note for the former sum given by the insured to the agent, who, by agreement, paid the first premium and sought to collect from the insured only the amount of the note. Dunn v. Abrams, 97 Ga. 762.

A statement by the insurance agent that the company will allow an advance dividend, even if not fulfilled, is not a misrepresentation of and its tender is rejected, his retention of the policy thereafter without appropriating it or making any use of it will not render him liable upon his note, and he may set up the facts as a defense in a suit upon it by the insurer.¹

But if the Applicant Does Not Offer to Return the Policy, or does not request its correction, he cannot, in an action upon his note, set up the defense that the policy is *ultra vires*² or not of the kind contracted for,³ or that there is an error in spelling his name in it,⁴ or that it misdescribes the location of the property insured,⁵ or that he has, without fraud, made such misstatements of material facts as would, if pleaded by the insurer, defeat a recovery on the policy.⁶

Refusal to Accept Corrected Policy. — If, after the contract has been consummated, the insured discovers that the policy does not properly express the contract, and upon complaint the insurer tenders a corrected policy, the insured cannot refuse to accept it or deny his liability on the notes given for the premium.⁷

c. WHEN LIABILITY ON POLICY IS SUSPENDED. — A provision in a policy of insurance that if the note given for the premium is not paid at maturity the insurer will not be liable for any loss occurring while the note is unpaid, does not prevent its collection after its dishonor. The insured is not relieved from his obligation to pay the note by the fact that he forfeits for the time the protection to secure which it was given;⁸ but it has been held in Ohio that he is entitled to credit on the note for the premium unearned by the insurer while the note remained unpaid.⁹

d. WHEN INSURER CANCELS POLICY. — The fact that the insurer under a power reserved in the policy has canceled the risk before the payment of the premium note does not entirely discharge the insured from liability thereon, but discharges him only to the extent of the unearned premium.¹⁰

2. Liability of Insurer for Return of Premiums — a. IN GENERAL. — The fact which would avoid a note. Cunyus v. Guenther, 96 Ala. 564.

1. Jones v. Gilbert, 93 Ga. 604.

Reservation of Right to Reject Policy. — An insurance agent with apparent authority to receive conditional applications for insurance obtained the defendant's note for a premium, under a written agreement with him that the policy should be sent by mail and if unsatisfactory might be rejected, and that on notice of the nonacceptance of the policy, the note should be returned. It was held that the note and written agreement formed one contract, and that upon the rejection of the policy the company could not treat the agreement of the agent as having been made without authority and sue on the note. Jacoway v. German Ins. Co., 49 Ark. 320.

2. Thompson Lumber Co. v. Mutual F. Ins. Co., 66 Ill. App. 254.

When Policy Does Not Express Contract. — In Perry v. Archard, (Indian Ter. 1897) 42 S. W. Rep. 421, the defendant made application for a life-insurance policy that would mature in fifteen years, but received instead a policy to mature in twenty years. He made no complaint, and did not offer to return the policy, but set up the facts as a defense to an action on a note given for the first year's premium. It was held that the defense was without merit.

Paying Premium in Quarterly Instalments. — Where the annual premium on a policy of life insurance, primarily payable in advance, was by express stipulation made payable quarterly in advance, and the insured died after the payment of the first quarterly instalment, the liability of an insurance company for the return of premiums paid, in the absence of a provision in the policy or in the state insurance law regulating the matter, depends largely upon the question whether the policy has ever become a binding contract between the parties.¹

b. WHEN RISK HAS NEVER ATTACHED — (1) Insurer Must Return Premiums. — If, from noncompliance with some condition precedent, or other cause, the policy never takes effect as a binding contract, and the insurer has consequently been subjected to no liability, there has been no consideration for the payment of the premiums, and the person paying them may recover them back.²

Effect of Estoppel upon Company. — The fact that the insurance company might, in case of loss, be estopped by its knowledge of the breach of the condition precedent or by its action in receiving and retaining the premium from denying its liability on the policy, does not affect the right of the assured to demand the return of the premiums paid.³

(2) Misrepresentation, Concealment, or False Warranty by Assured. — If, on the other hand, a policy is void ab initio by reason of some misrepresentation, concealment, or false warranty by the assured, he cannot recover back the premiums paid.⁴

c. WHEN RISK HAS ATTACHED — (1) Forfeiture of Insurance by Acts of Assured. — If a policy which has once attached lapses by reason of the failure of the assured to comply with some of its conditions, he is not entitled to a recovery of the unearned premiums paid upon it.⁵

(2) Wrongful Cancellation by Insurer. — But if the insurance company wrongfully revokes the policy, the assured may recover the full amount of the premiums paid thereon, with interest, even though he has had the benefit of the insurance under it from its inception to the day of its wrongful revocation, and though such revocation would not operate in law to avoid the contract. The insured may elect whether he will enforce the policy or treat it as rescinded.⁶

d. ENTIRE AND DIVISIBLE CONTRACTS. — If the contract of insurance is entire and indivisible, a cause of avoidance or forfeiture in respect to a part of the property insured affects the whole contract, and the insured is not entitled to recover the premiums unearned upon the parts not affected.⁷ But if the risk consists of several separate parts and the insurer elects to cancel the whole contract, the insured is entitled to a return of the part of the premium paid upon the items not affected.⁸

Buildings and Contents. — When, however, a policy of insurance covers a building and personal property within it, or so attached to it that its loss would be the natural consequence of the destruction of the building, as a dwelling house and furniture or a gin house and fixtures, a false warranty as to the building avoids the whole policy.⁹

VII. EVIDENCE — 1. Burden of Proof. — a. IN GENERAL. — As in the case of other contracts, one suing upon a policy of insurance has the burden of showing that the contract was made,¹ except so far as statutory provisions may dispense with such proofs.² It has been held that the defendant insurance company has the burden of showing that the action was not brought within the time stipulated in the policy.³ The rule that one in exclusive possession of knowledge of certain facts is bound to produce evidence in regard thereto, has been applied to the case of an insurance company failing to produce evidence upon the question of the authority of an alleged agent.⁴

b. TITLE AND INTEREST OF PLAINTIFF. — The burden is on the plaintiff upon an issue as to whether he has an insurable interest in the property insured.⁵ But the burden of showing that the plaintiffs are not beneficiaries named in the policy is on the defendant, if they are in actual possession of the policy and file it as a part of their petition.⁶ And the fact that a policy was issued to the plaintiff upon certain property as belonging to him constitutes such an admission of his title as to cast upon the insurer the burden of showing that he is not the owner.⁷ If the defendant insurance company, in an action by the assignee of the policy, defends on the ground that there has been a prior assignment to a third person, it has the burden of proving such defense.⁸

c. CONDITIONS, REPRESENTATIONS, AND WARRANTIES. — The majority of courts have adopted the rule that the plaintiff in an action on an insurance policy has not the burden of proving compliance with conditions therein, but the insurer wishing to avoid liability by showing the breach of a condition avoiding the policy has the burden of proving the existence of the condition and its breach.⁹ The same rule has been applied in regard to misstatements or misrepresentations by the insured at the time of obtaining the insurance, which, it is held, are matters of defense to be established by the insurer.¹ In some cases, however, a distinction is made between mere representations and warranties, and it is held that a compliance with a warranty must be established by the plaintiff, on the ground that this is a condition precedent to the very existence of the contract of insurance.² Such distinction, however, is opposed by the weight of authority, especially in the later decisions; and the rule that the burden of proof is on the insurer is held to apply in the case of

But it has been held that where the pleadings are so framed that the defendant assumes the burden of showing a breach of warranty the burden is upon him. Leete v. Gresham L. Ins. Co., 7 Eng. L. & Eq. 578; Wilkins v. Germania F. Ins. Co., 57 Iowa 529.

And it has been held that when the allegation of breach of warranty amounts to the allegation of fraud, the burden of proof is upon the defendant, for the reason that the presumption is always in favor of innocence against fraud. Wilkins v. Germania F. Ins. Co., 57 Iowa 529.

warranties as well as in the case of mere representations, since to require proof by the insured of compliance with the multifarious stipulations in a modern policy of insurance would impose on him an excessive burden.¹ In a quite recent case in a federal court a distinction was made between warranties contained in the application and those in the policy, and it was held that the insured was bound to show compliance with the latter, while as to the former the burden was on the insurer.² And it has been held that a warranty which is qualified as being true to the best of the applicant's knowledge and belief, or in some similar manner, is not a condition precedent, the truth of which must be proven by the beneficiary in order to recover upon the policy; but the burden is upon the insurer to establish the falsity of the warranty and knowledge by the insured of such falsity.³ The fact that the insured in his complaint alleges performance of the conditions, this being denied by the insurer, does not cast the burden of proof on the insured.⁴

d. ESTOPPEL AND WAIVER. — The burden is on the insured to show that misstatements in the application were written therein by an agent of the insurer without the knowledge of the insured,⁵ or that the insurer knew at the time of issuing the policy that the facts were otherwise than as stated,⁶ or that the insurer either directly or through an agent waived a breach of condition subsequent to the issuance of the policy.⁷

e. CAUSE OF LOSS OR INJURY. — It is generally held that it is for the insurer to show that the loss or injury was from a cause or risk specifically excepted in the policy,⁸ though occasionally it has been held that the burden of showing that the case fell within an exception was on the insured;¹ but the tendency seems to be to regard such exceptions as in the nature of conditions subsequent rather than exceptions properly so called.² Accordingly it is held that where an accident or life policy excepts losses caused by suicide, the burden of showing suicide is on the insurance company.³ In cases of marine insurance, however, the plaintiff seems to be generally held to the duty of showing that the cause of loss was within the risks insured against;⁴ and in an action on a policy insuring against death or injury from accident, the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the death or injury was caused by an accident and not otherwise.⁵ The burden is on the insurer to show that the loss or injury was caused by the negligence⁶ or that a fire loss was intentionally caused by the insured.⁷ When the policy provides that it shall not cover death or injury caused by voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, the burden of proving that it did result from such exposure is upon the insurer.⁸

f. PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS. — It has been held that the burden is on the insured to show that the policy was kept in force by the payment of premiums.¹ But it was held that where the amount of the premium was variable, and knowledge thereof rested solely with the insurer, the latter had the burden of showing such amount.²

g. CANCELLATION OF POLICY. — Where the insurer seeks to excuse himself from liability upon the ground that the contract of insurance, though once existent and valid, has been canceled, he has the burden of establishing such fact.³

h. NOTICE AND PROOFS OF LOSS. — It is conceded that the burden of showing that reasonable and proper notice and proofs of loss were furnished or that such requirements were waived is upon the person suing on the policy.⁴ But the burden is on the defendant to show that he notified the insured of a defect in such proofs within a reasonable time.⁵

i. ARBITRATION OR REFERENCE. — It has been held that the burden is on the plaintiff to show compliance with a requirement of arbitration or reference as a condition precedent to suit.⁶ After an award by appraisers or arbitrators, the burden of proof is upon one seeking to attack the award.⁷

indebtedness of the insured to such creditor.¹ But it has been held that an assignor of the policy who admitted the assignment had the burden of showing that a payment by the insurer to the assignee was collusive.²

2. Evidence as to Particular Issues — a. EXISTENCE AND TERMS OF CONTRACT. — Evidence that an agent was instructed to telegraph to the company upon the occurrence of a loss is admissible in connection with evidence that he did not so telegraph, to show that there was no contract of insurance at the time of the loss.³ But evidence as to the insurer's knowledge of the manner in which the premises were occupied was held to be too remote on the question whether the contract was made,⁴ and evidence that the wife of the insured objected to his taking the policy declared on is inadmissible on this issue.⁵ The fact that the alleged contract of insurance was verbal only does not render it necessary to establish its existence by more than a preponderance of the evidence.⁶ All papers on which the company acted in deciding to grant the policy are stated to be admissible,⁷ and previous contracts of insurance between the same parties are likewise admissible to show the terms of the new contract.⁸

b. FRAUD IN APPLICATION. — Similar false answers on applications for other insurance are admissible to show that a false answer was made in bad faith, though such other answers were given after the application for the particular insurance in question.⁹

c. BREACH OF CONDITIONS. — On an issue as to whether a certain house was occupied, evidence that another house belonging to the insured had more furniture in it than the house in question was held to be too remote.¹⁰ And a receipt showing when the last occupant of the insured building leased another residence has been held to be inadmissible to show when the former building was vacated.¹¹ Evidence that the suspension of the operation of a factory was for lack of supplies and was incidental to the business was admissible to show that it was not within a condition against a cessation of operations.¹²

d. PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS. — The insured may show payment of the premiums, and may testify to that fact himself;¹³ and declarations by an agent to a third person are admissible for this purpose.¹⁴ Where the defense to an action on the policy was based on failure of the insured to pay a premium note, evidence that the note belonged to the defendant's agent and not to the company was held admissible.¹⁵ A letter of the insured, inclosing the premium, is admissible to show tender as a prerequisite to suit on the policy.¹⁶

Receipt or Acknowledgment of Payment. — While a mere receipt for the premium is, like other receipts, merely prima facie evidence that the premium was paid,¹⁷ a different effect has been given by a majority of the courts to an acknowledgment of payment in the policy itself, if this has been duly delivered, such an acknowledgment being considered sufficient to estop the insurer from contending that the contract is not in force on the ground that the premium has not been paid.¹ Some courts, however, give to such an acknowledgment in the policy the same effect merely as to other receipts, and consider it prima facie evidence only of payment.² Where a policy requires that a receipt for a premium shall be under seal, a receipt not under seal is inadmissible, but it may be otherwise shown that the premium has been paid.³

e. MATTERS MATERIAL TO RISK — (1) Property Insurance. — There is a decided conflict in the cases in both England and the United States as to whether persons engaged in and familiar with the insurance business can testify on the question whether facts undisclosed by the insured at the time of taking out the insurance, or changes thereafter occurring in the condition of the property insured, are material to the risk.⁴ The authorities, however, generally

In Brown v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co., 59 N. H. 298, 47 Am. Rep. 205, it was held that one accepting a receipt acknowledging the payment of the advance premium could not claim that the company was estopped to deny that receipt, if he knew as a matter of fact that he was not entitled to the receipt, because the premium was not paid.

insurance policy is that the fire was caused by the insured, any evidence tending to show motive on his part for causing the fire is admissible,¹ as that the amount of insurance was in excess of the value of the property;² and evidence as to the character of the fire is also admissible.³ The insured may, to rebut the charge, introduce evidence that property belonging to him or his near relatives, which was not insured, was also destroyed.⁴ Evidence of the good character of the insured is not admissible in his favor.⁵ Evidence that certain persons feared that the insured would cause a fire is inadmissible.⁶ Evidence that the insured made a false claim against another insurance company is admissible,⁷ as also is evidence that he asked a person to set fire to a building belonging to another with the purpose of then asking such person to set fire to his own building.⁸

Quantum of Evidence. — It is now generally held that a defense in an action on a policy of fire insurance on the ground that the fire was caused by the insured need be sustained only by a preponderance of evidence, and that the fact that an accusation of crime is involved does not require evidence excluding all reasonable doubt.⁹ In England, however, and occasionally in the United States, the contrary rule has been maintained.¹⁰ It is proper for the jury to consider the presumption in favor of one's innocence of a criminal act.¹¹

at the time near by, and that the two had previously quarreled, was held admissible, as was evidence that half an hour after the killing such other person stated that he had killed the insured; but the records of the indictment of such person for the killing and of his subsequent pardon were held to be too remote.¹

2. AMOUNT OF LOSS. — Except in the case of a valued policy, the amount named in the policy is not evidence of the value of the goods.² A former policy on the same stock, shown to the insurer at the time of taking out the insurance, is competent in connection with evidence that the quantity and value remained about the same until the time of the loss.³ The original cost of the goods destroyed is admissible,⁴ provided the condition at the time of purchase and of loss was the same.⁵ The cost of replacing the property lost or repairing the injury is admissible.⁶ So evidence of the cost at the time of trial of such a building as that destroyed is admissible as bearing on its value at the time of the loss;⁷ and the portion of the cost price which could be obtained for the injured stock after the fire is admissible.⁸ If the property has no fixed market value, the price at which the insured has offered to sell it is admissible.⁹ Where no better evidence is obtainable, one who has seen the property may testify as to its character and extent,¹⁰ as may the plaintiff himself;¹¹ and persons familiar with property of that character who have seen it may testify as to its value.¹² But persons who merely saw the debris and ashes after the fire cannot give their opinions as to the amount of property destroyed.¹³ The rental of the building insured is admissible on the question of its value,¹⁴ but the rental two years prior to the loss has been held to be too remote.¹⁵ Evidence as to the amount of loss is not rendered inadmissible by the fact that the policy provided for the arbitration or appraisal of the loss, if such provision is waived by the insurer.¹⁶

made therefrom by an expert accountant is admissible.¹ But a witness cannot testify as to the contents of such books when they were not kept by him and are not verified in any way.² Inventories of the goods destroyed, made before their destruction, are admissible, if duly proven and authenticated, to show the amount of the loss;³ and it is immaterial that the inventory was made by a former owner of the goods before they became the property of the insured.⁴ The quantity of goods purchased after the making of the inventory and before the loss, the amount of sales, and the average profit thereon may also be shown.⁵ If an inventory has been destroyed, parol evidence of its contents is admissible.⁶ Where the policy required the insured to keep a set of books showing a complete record of the business, inventories and accounts not complying with such requirement are inadmissible;⁷ but a requirement that books shall be kept does not render inadmissible other testimony as to the value of the property.⁸ A schedule of the goods destroyed, made after the fire, by the bookkeeper of the insured, may be used by him to refresh his memory in testifying,⁹ and an invoice made by a sheriff levying an attachment after the fire has been held to be admissible.¹⁰

Overvaluation. — Evidence that the person whose stock of goods was insured was losing money in his business is not admissible to show fraud by him in making false statements as to the amount of goods which he had on hand at the time of the fire,¹¹ nor is evidence of drunkenness or idleness on his part after the fire admissible to show that he saved a greater amount than was stated by him.¹² Offers for the insured property made after the issuance of the policy are not admissible to show an overvaluation of the property at the time of obtaining a valued policy.¹³ To show that the plaintiff has exaggerated his loss, an affidavit as to the value of his stock, made at the time of applying for a trader's license, is admissible,¹⁴ as is a return made by him to the tax assessor.¹⁵ And it has been held that in the absence of trustworthy books and of specific evidence by persons other than the plaintiffs themselves, the defendant may show that persons engaged in the same trade in that locality did not carry a stock of more than a certain proportion of the annual sales, and that, consequently, the claim of the insured must be exaggerated.¹⁶

Total or Partial Loss. — On an issue as to whether there was a total loss, evidence that only a certain portion of the building had been destroyed, that about ninety per cent. of the material thereof was in good condition, and that the building could be entirely renovated by replacing the damaged portions,

3. Particular Classes of Evidence — a. POLICY AND APPLICATION. — According to some authorities the policy is admissible without the application on which it was issued although the latter is expressly made a part of the policy;² but elsewhere it is held that the policy is not admissible without the application.³ Where the statute requires that the application be attached to the policy in order to be a part thereof, the policy is admissible without the application if this is not so attached.⁴ And it has been held that where the application is not admissible for failure to comply with such a statute, parol evidence of the contents of the application is admissible.⁵ The policy is also admissible without the application if the latter is merely referred to in the policy, and is not made a part thereof,⁶ as it is where the alleged application was never signed by the applicant or by his authority.⁷ The policy is likewise admissible without the application if this is in the possession of the insurance company, which refuses to produce it.⁸

b. PAROL EVIDENCE. — As in the case of other written contracts, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or contradict a written policy or contract of insurance.⁹ It is, however, admissible to explain the meaning and scope which it was intended to give to the words used to describe the property insured;¹ and for this purpose evidence of the usage of the trade or business in which the insured property is employed is admissible.² Parol evidence is also admissible, as in the case of all written contracts, to explain technical words and phrases in the policy or to show that common words therein have by usage obtained a technical meaning in the particular connection in which they are used.³ So where a policy was issued on a "fancy-goods and Yankee-notion store," it was held that evidence was admissible to show that fireworks were an ordinary part of the stock of such stores, so as to entitle the insured to keep them, although the policy provided that fireworks should not be covered unless "specially written in the policy."⁴ When the words designating the beneficiaries of the insurance are ambiguous or indefinite, parol evidence is admissible to show who are meant thereby and what their interests are.⁵

But evidence is not admissible to show the beneficiaries intended if they are clearly described in the policy.¹

c. DECLARATIONS BY INSURED OR BENEFICIARY. — It is a general rule that declarations by the insured are not admissible as against beneficiaries of the policy unless they may fairly be considered a part of the res gestæ.² Declarations by a beneficiary, however, are admissible as against him.³ So statements by the beneficiary in the preliminary proofs are admissible against him as admissions on his part of facts therein stated.⁴

d. ADMISSIONS BY INSURER'S REPRESENTATIVES. — Admissions by officers and agents of the company, made within the limits of their authority, and while performing their duties in respect to the particular matter under consideration, are admissible to bind the insurer.⁵ But such admissions are not admissible if made at a time subsequent to the exercise of their authority in that regard.⁶

e. PROOFS OF LOSS. — Preliminary proofs of loss, death, or injury, furnished to the insurer by the insured, in compliance with the stipulations in the policy, are admissible to show that they were furnished in compliance with such stipulations, but not to prove any of the facts set forth therein, they being mere ex parte statements.⁷ Evidence other than the proofs themselves is admissible to show that they were furnished,¹ and it is not objectionable as being parol evidence.² The proofs of loss may also be admitted for the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness as to a fact therein stated.³

Secondary Evidence of the contents of the proofs of loss may be admitted in a proper case,⁴ and it has been held that the bringing of suit is sufficient notice to the defendant insurer to produce them, to authorize the introduction of secondary evidence of their contents.⁵

Evidence Contradictory of Proofs. — The insured is not concluded by statements in his proofs, but may introduce evidence to correct mistakes therein.⁶

I. DEFINITION. — An insurance broker is one who acts as a middleman between the insured and the insurer, and who solicits insurance from the public, under no employment from any special company, placing the orders secured either with companies selected by the insured, or, in the absence of such selection, with the companies selected by himself.¹

Distinguished from Insurance Agents. — There is a marked and well-defined distinction between insurance brokers and insurance agents representing corporations. Such insurance agents during their employment sustain a fixed and permanent

The term "insurance broker" is generally understood to mean a person who owes no duty or allegiance to any particular corporation. He is free to procure insurance for others in any company he may select, and to solicit and procure business and patronage for any insurance company or companies he may select. McKinney v. Alton, 41 Ill. App. 512.

The Massachusetts Statute (Acts 1887, c. 214, § 93) defines an insurance broker to be a person who "for compensation acts or aids in any manner in negotiating contracts of insurance or reinsurance, or placing risks, or effecting insurance or reinsurance for a person other than himself, and not being the appointed agent or officer of the company in which such insurance or reinsurance is effected." Davis relation to the companies they represent. They are clothed with general powers and authority, and assume responsibilities not conferred upon or assumed by brokers. They owe duty and allegiance to the companies employing them, and seek patronage only for the profit and benefit of such companies, and are precluded from soliciting insurance business for others.¹

II. AGENCY OF BROKER — 1. In General — a. ORDINARILY AGENT OF INSURED. — Ordinarily, an insurance broker is not the agent of the insurer,² but is the agent of the insured in all matters within the scope of his employment,³ and within that scope his acts, representations, and concealments are chargeable to and binding upon the insured.⁴ This is so even though the broker solicits the insurance,⁵ and the fact that the policy is delivered to him,⁶ Broker's Clerk. — A applied to B, an insurance broker, for insurance. B obtained a policy from C, agent for the defendant company. Afterwards, the defendant requested C to cancel and return the policy. C went to B's office, but finding him absent, informed D, the clerk in charge, that he was instructed to cancel the policy, and requested D to get it for cancellation. It was held that D, in returning the policy for cancellation, acted as the agent of A, and not as the agent of the defendant. Faulkner v. Manchester F. Assur. Co., 171 Mass. 349.

and that by an arrangement or agreement with the insurer or with an agent of the insurer he obtains from either his compensation, does not change his legal status.¹

b. WHEN AGENT OF INSURER — (1) When Employed as Such. — Though ordinarily the agent of the insured, a broker may be employed by the insurer as its agent, and when so employed, the acts of the broker, within the scope of his employment, will bind the insurer.²

(2) Agency in Delivering Policy and Collecting Premium. — In some of the United States it has been held that a broker is the agent of the insurer for the purpose of delivering the policy and collecting the premium,³ but in other states it has been held that the broker is not the agent of the insurer for the purpose of receiving the premium.⁴

c. EFFECT OF PROVISION IN POLICY DECLARING BROKER AGENT OF INSURED. — Policies of insurance frequently contain a clause providing that if any broker or any person other than the insured has procured the policy, he shall be deemed to be the agent of the insured and not of the insurer in any transaction relating to the insurance. It has been held that this is a contract which it is entirely competent for the parties to make,⁵ and that under it the broker who procures the policy is the agent of the insured in all matters relating to its procurement,⁶ and that his representations will bind the insured.⁷ But in Illinois it has been held that if, in procuring the policy, or in some matter connected with it, the broker in fact acted as the agent of the insurer, he will be regarded as the insurer's agent, and his acts and knowledge will be binding upon the insurer, notwithstanding such a provision in the policy.⁸

2. Agency of Broker When Employed by Insurer. — Union Ins. Co. v. Chipp, 93 Ill. 96; Newark F. Ins. Co. v. Sammons, 110 Ill. 166, affirming 11 Ill. App. 230.

Both the insured and the insurer may, without relation to each other, place their business in the hands of a broker, with, it may be, conditioned terms, as with right of inspection or approval, etc. East St. Louis v. Brenner, 59 Ill. App. 608.

3. Broker Agent of Insurer in Delivering Policy and Collecting Premium. — Indiana Ins. Co. v. Hartwell, 123 Ind. 178 [compare Criswell v. Riley, 5 Ind. App. 496]; Gude v. Exchange F. Ins. Co., 53 Minn. 220.

In Texas it has been held that an insurance broker is the agent of the insurer as to the premium, but for nothing else. East Texas F.

Ins. Co. v. Blum, 76 Tex. 653; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 82 Tex. 636.

Under the Massachusetts Statute (Acts 1887, c. 214, § 90) an insurance broker is the agent of the insurer for the purpose of receiving the premium, notwithstanding any conditions or stipulations to the contrary in the policy or contract. Davis v. Aetna Mut. F. Ins. Co., 67 N. H. 335.

4. Broker Not Agent of Insurer to Receive Premium. — Gentry v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 15 Mo. App. 215; Pottsville Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Minnequa Springs Imp. Co., 100 Pa. St. 137.

Rule in Illinois. — In Illinois it has been held that the question whether an insurance broker acted as the agent of the insurer in receiving the premium is one of fact, to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the particular case; and that to determine the question, correspondence between the broker and the insurer is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing their previous relations and methods of business in respect to insurance effected through the instrumentality of the broker. Sun Mut. Ins. Co. v. Saginaw Barrel Co., 114 Ill. 99.

7. Wood v. Firemen's F. Ins. Co., 126 Mass. 316.

For an interpretation of this provision, see also infra, this section, When Employed Only to Procure Policy.

8. Rule in Illinois. — Union Ins. Co. v. Chipp, Volume XVI.

2. When Employed Only to Procure Policy. — When the broker's employment extends only to the procurement of the policy, his agency is not continuing. It ceases when the purpose of his employment has been accomplished, that is, upon the execution and delivery of the policy;¹ and notice to him of the cancellation of the policy is not notice to the insured,² notwithstanding the provision frequently inserted in policies that the person who procures the insurance shall be deemed the agent of the insured and not of the company in any transaction relating to the insurance. Such a provision imports nothing more than that the person obtaining the insurance is to be deemed the agent of the insured in matters immediately connected with the procurement of the policy.³

Evidence of a General Custom in the Insurance Business authorizing an insurance company entitled to terminate its policy upon notice, to give such notice to the broker by or through whom the insurance was procured, is not admissible.⁴

If the Broker Undertakes to Do Acts Outside of His Employment, the question for whom he acts will depend upon the special circumstances of the case; and if either the assured or the insurer relies upon such acts to bind the other party, the burden of proof rests upon him who seeks to bind the other thereby to prove his authority. In the absence of direct proof of actual authority, and where the effort is to bind the insurer, the insured may establish the agency by showing what acts the insurer has permitted the broker to do, and that the act relied on ought reasonably to be inferred to be within the scope of the apparent authority implied from such acts.¹

3. When Authorized to Represent Principal in All Insurance Matters. — Where the broker is employed to represent the principal in all matters relating to insurance, his authority as agent extends not only to the procuring of a policy, but to the modifying or canceling of it,² and notice to him by the insurer of the cancellation of a policy will bind the insured.³

III. STATUTES REQUIRING BROKER TO OBTAIN LICENSE. — In some of the United States there are statutes prohibiting any person from acting as an insurance broker without a license,⁴ and the right to impose this prohibition upon and to require the payment of a license fee from persons desiring to carry on the insurance brokerage business within their limits has in many cases been conferred upon municipal corporations.⁵

Brokerage Contract by Unlicensed Broker Void. — Where, in violation of such a statute or of a municipal ordinance enacted in pursuance of an authority so conferred, an unlicensed broker enters into a contract to aid in negotiating contracts of insurance, such contract is void, and the broker cannot recover under it the compensation that it was agreed he should receive for his services.⁶

IV. RIGHTS, DUTIES, AND LIABILITIES OF BROKERS — 1. Lien upon Policy and Moneys Received Thereon — a. IN GENERAL. — An insurance broker has a lien upon all policies in his hands procured by him for his principal, and also upon the moneys received by him upon such policies for the payment of the sums due to him for commissions, disbursements, advances, and services in and about the policies,⁷ but the lien does not extend to cover any balance due upon business foreign to that of effecting insurances.⁸ The mere intermingling of charges in reference to policies with other items in general account is not a waiver of the lien.⁹

b. WHEN BROKER IS EMPLOYED BY AGENT — (1) When Broker Knows of Agency. — When it is known to the insurance broker that the person who employs him is merely the agent for the party insured, he has a lien for the premiums paid by him and for his commissions upon the policies which he effects,¹⁰ but not for the general balance of his insurance account with the agent.¹¹

(2) When Broker Does Not Know of Agency. — But when it is not known to the broker that his employer is merely an agent, he has a lien for such general balance of his insurance account,¹² and has the right to apply money received upon the policy to the satisfaction of that balance, as well after as before notice that it belongs to a third person.¹

c. EXTINGUISHMENT OF LIEN BY PARTING WITH POLICY. — The lien of the broker is extinguished when he parts with the possession of the policies by their delivery to the insured or his agent.²

d. REATTACHMENT OF LIEN UPON REPOSSESSION OF POLICY. — The lien, however, again attaches, or, in the language of the books, is revived, if the policies come again into the broker's possession from the person against whom the right originally existed.³ But it does not reattach if they come again into his possession as the property of some other person, or if new intermediate equities have affected them;⁴ nor will it attach if the broker's manner of parting with the policies manifested an intention to abandon the lien.⁵

2. Duty and Liability to Principal — a. IN GENERAL. — Insurance brokers, by holding themselves out as persons engaged in the business of effecting insurance, assume to have the requisite knowledge and ability to transact such business for their patrons, and they are bound to use reasonable skill, care, and diligence in transacting that business. If they fail to do so, and their negligence proximately results in loss or damage to their employers, they will be liable for such loss or damage in an action therefor.⁶

b. WHEN BROKER RECEIVES INSTRUCTIONS FROM PRINCIPAL. — When a broker receives an instruction from his principal in any matter relating to the insurance, he is bound to obey it, and if he neglects to do so he will be liable to the principal for any loss proximately resulting from such negligence.⁷

c. WHEN MATTER IS LEFT TO BROKER'S DISCRETION. — But where a matter relating to the insurance is left to the discretion of the broker, and he acts bona fide and with due regard to his principal's interest, he will not be liable for a loss which would not have occurred had he pursued a different course in the matter.⁸

d. LIABILITY FOR FRAUDULENTLY PROCURING INSURANCE IN NON-EXISTENT COMPANY. — If an insurance broker wilfully and fraudulently procures insurance for a patron in a company which does not exist, he will be liable for any loss that results from his so doing.⁹

policy is the person who owns the property, applies for the insurance, pays the premium, and signs the deposit note, and not another person to whom the money is payable in case of loss, although he may have a lease of the premises. Sanford v. Mechanics' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 12 Cush. (Mass.) 541, where the erection of certain buildings by an under lessee of one to whom the insurance money was payable was held not to render the policy void as violating a by-law which prohibited the insured from altering the building without the consent of the company, or doing anything to increase the risk.

But in interpreting a policy of insurance containing a clause that before payment "all sums due to the company from the insured" should be first deducted, Story, J., said: "It appears to me that the insured, in the sense of the clause, must mean not the party who procures the insurance, but the party for whose benefit the insurance is made. He and he only can properly be said to be the insured; for he is ultimately to pay the premium and to have the benefit if a loss occurs. I do not say that this, the primary meaning of the words, may not be displaced by showing that the parties to the contract have used them in a different sense, as the designation of the person in whose name the policy is made. But the language ought to be very clear in its import which should lead to such a result." Hurlbert v. Pacific Ins. Co., 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 479.

With reference to orders sent to common carriers to forward goods, it was said in Peek v. North Staffordshire R. Co., El. Bl. & El. 979, 96 E. C. L. 979: "The ordinary meaning of 'insured' is that the insurer stands the risk, and 'uninsured,' that the owner does so."

INSURRECTION.

BY A. S. H. BRISTOW.

- I. DEFINITION, 977.
- II. SCOPE OF ARTICLE, 977.
- III. SUPPRESSION OF INSURRECTION, 977.

CROSS-REFERENCES.

For other matters of SUBSTANTIVE LAW and EVIDENCE related to this subject, see the titles MOBS; RIOTS; WAR.

I. DEFINITION. — An insurrection is a rising against civil or political authority; the open and active opposition of a number of persons to the execution of law in a city or state.¹

Bloodshed Unnecessary. — To constitute an insurrection it is not necessary that there should be bloodshed or that the dimensions of the rising should be so portentous as to insure probable success.²

II. SCOPE OF ARTICLE. — The late war between the states is frequently referred to in the decisions as an insurrection; but, as has been said, it was not the less a civil war because it might be called an insurrection,³ and hence the adjudications to which it has given rise will be reserved for discussion in a subsequent title.⁴

III. SUPPRESSION OF INSURRECTION — By State Military. — Although a state cannot establish a permanent military government, yet it may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by the civil authority; and the state must determine for itself what degree of force the crisis demands.⁵

After Martial Law Is Declared an officer may lawfully arrest any one who he has reasonable grounds to believe is engaged in the insurrection, or may order the forcible entry of a house. But no more force can be used than is necessary to accomplish the object; and if the power is exercised for the purpose of oppression, or if any injury is wilfully done to person or property, the person by whom or by whose order it is committed will be answerable.⁶

When President May Assist in Suppression. — By the Act of Congress of Feb. 28, 1795, it was provided that in case of an insurrection in any state against the government thereof "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the legislature of such state or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), to call forth such number of the militia of any other state or states as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."⁷ In a recent decision in Idaho it was held that the proclamation of the governor declaring a county to be in a state of insur-

3. Intake — Intaken. (See also the title CONTRACTS OF AFFREIGHTMENT AND CHARTER-PARTIES, vol. 7, p. 254.) — In Harrison v. One Thousand Bags of Sugar, 44 Fed. Rep. 687, it was said: "A printed form was employed, and but for the erasure of the word 'delivered' and the interlineation of the words 'intake weight' * * * no question would arise. The payment of freight would be limited, in plain terms, to the cargo delivered. It would read, 'the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, at the rate of nine shillings sterling per ton of 20 cwt., delivered;' and if no other change had been made than to add the words 'intake weight,' there would still be no question. The word 'delivered,' immediately following, would limit the freight to the part of cargo delivered; but this word being erased, it is, I think, clear that the parties must be held to have stipulated for payment on the entire 'intake weight,' unless the question is controlled by other language of the charter." See also Robinson v. Knights L. R. 8 C. P. 468; Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage, L. R. 9 Q. B. 99; Spaight v. Farnworth, 5 Q. B. D. 115.

A charter-party provided for a certain rate of freight on the cargo intaken. The word "delivered" in the charter-party had been stricken out and the word intaken written in. The court said, in construing this provision: "If the number of tons delivered is conclusive evidence of the number of tons intaken, the careful erasure from the charter-party of the printed word 'delivered' and the insertion of the written word intaken was an idle ceremony. This would assume, and give to respondents the full benefit of the assumption, that the weight of the cargo is fixed by a definite, certain, inflexible, and unchangeable standard; that there can be no error or fluctuation, loss of quantity, or diminution in weight; and that the exact number of tons which went in at Pomaron would come out here. The evidence discloses the fact that the weight of the intaken cargo and the output at the port of delivery seldom, if ever, agree." The Frogner, 49 Fed. Rep. 877.

4. Integrity and Honesty. (See also the title EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS, vol. 11, p. 720.) — In Root v. Davis, 10 Mont. 266, it was said, per Blake, C. J., dissenting: "I have not been able to find in the authorities a satisfactory definition of the term integrity, which is found in the statutes relating to the competency of an administrator. Its meaning should not be restricted to what is generally understood by the word 'honesty,' although the last is properly deemed by lexicographers a synonym. * * * When the duties of the position are considered it is evident that the want of integrity which renders a person incompetent to receive this appointment should be defined. The following definition by Webster is apposite: 'Freedom from every biasing or corrupt influence or motive.' The court below was called upon to determine judicially, from all the evidence, not merely whether John A. Davis was an honest or a dishonest man in the ordinary signification of words, but whether he was free from all bias, influence, or motive, which would interfere with the exercise of his functions as an administrator of the estate of his deceased brother."

In Matter of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 307, it was said: "The word integrity, as here used, means soundness of moral principle and character, as shown by a person's dealing with others, in the making and performance of contracts, in fidelity and honesty in the discharge of trusts. In short, it is used as a synonym for probity, honesty, and uprightness in business relations with others."

5. Intelligent. — As to the requirement that a juror should be intelligent, see People v. McLaughlin, 2 N. Y. App. Div. 419, and see the title JURY AND JURY TRIAL.

6. Intelligence Office. — In Keim v. Chicago, 46 Ill. App. 445, it was held that the city of Chicago not having been empowered to license, prohibit, or regulate intelligence offices, the penalty prescribed for the violation of its ordinances relating to the subject could not be imposed. And so in State v. Von Sachs, 45 La. Ann. 1416, a similar ordinance of the city of New Orleans was held void as being unconstitutional. See generally the titles MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS; ORDINANCES.

drunkenness.¹ An occasional use of alcoholic liquors is not to be deemed intemperance, but there must be indulgence to such an extent as would be considered an excess.²

1. Mullinix v. People, 76 Ill. 213.

2. Mowry v. Home L. Ins. Co., 9 R. I. 355.

Intemperate. — The defendant, in an answer in a suit to foreclose a mortgage given by her deceased husband, for whom she was administratrix, admitted the execution of the mortgage, but averred that it had been obtained from her husband, who was an illiterate and intemperate man, by great importunity and undue influence. The court said: "Giving his character in her answer, she has used the word intemperate, from which it may be inferred that he was either excessive in meat and drink or that he was passionate or ungovernable. The word intemperate, according to the most approved authorities, conveys both of those meanings. The defendant now alleges, by her petition, that the latter was the sense in which she intended to use the word. Therefore it is ordered that the defendant be, and she is hereby, permitted to file a supplemental answer, correcting the mistake." Murdock's Case, 2 Bland (Md.) 463.

Intemperate Habits. (See also the titles INTOXICATING LIQUORS; LIFE INSURANCE.) — Intemperate habits, within the meaning of the statute against selling liquors to a person of known intemperate habits, cannot be predicated of a person who occasionally drinks to excess. But it is not necessary to show that he is drunk every day. If sobriety is the rule and occasional intoxication the exception, he is not within the statute; and, on the other hand, if the habit is to drink to intoxication when occasion offers, and sobriety or abstinence is the exception — as when one is accustomed to remain sober while at home, but generally drinks to excess when in company, or when visiting the town or village — the charge of intemperate habits is sustained. Tatum v. State, 63 Ala. 148.

3. In a Patent for lands the words "intended for public uses" were held equivalent to "dedicated to public use." Com. v. Alburger, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 480.

Intoxicating Liquors. (See also the title INTOXICATING LIQUORS.) — Where a statute orders the forfeiture of liquors "intended for sale contrary to law," the forfeiture will take place if any person has an intent to sell them unlawfully. But where the offense is keeping them "with intent" to sell, the intention on the part of the particular person charged must be proved. State v. Learned, 47 Me. 426.

Postal Laws. (See also the title POSTAL LAWS.) — A letter with a fictitious address, which cannot be delivered, is not "intended to be conveyed by mail," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the embezzlement of such a letter. U. S. v. Denicke, 35 Fed. Rep. 407. See also U. S. v. Matthews, 35 Fed. Rep. 896. But see U. S. v. Smith, 40 Fed. Rep. 755, where these cases are disapproved. Nor is a decoy letter placed in a receptacle for unmailable matter within such statute. U. S. v. Rapp, 30 Fed. Rep. 818.

But it has been held sufficient evidence that letters are "intended to be carried by a letter carrier," that they are deposited in pillar boxes, to be carried to the post office, although it is intended to intercept them after they have passed through the hands of a suspected employee. U. S. v. Wight, 38 Fed. Rep. 106.

Intended to Be Recorded. — The words "intended to be forthwith recorded," used in a deed in reference to a power of attorney, under which the deed purports to have been made, imply a covenant on the part of the grantor to procure the recordation of the power within a reasonable time. Penn. v. Preston, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 14.

Intended Road. — A covenant for the free use of the "newly intended road whenever the same may be made," will not apply to a road which, when the parties contracted, it was intended to make, but which was executed and complete before the sealing of the covenant. Crisp v. Price, 5 Taunt. 548, 1 E. C. L. 183.

Intended to Locate. (See also the titles PUBLIC LANDS; STATE LANDS.) — In a case of disputed title to land the court held the warrant under which the plaintiff claimed to be descriptive to a common intent, and the surveys to be chamber surveys, but referred the question of actual location to the jurors, with the instruction that if they believed the warrants were located or intended to be located on the land claimed by the plaintiff, their verdict should be for the plaintiff, and also if they believed that the surveyor intended to locate the surveys on the land claimed, the law located them there. The appellate court said: "He did not mean that a mere unexecuted intention to appropriate could be treated as a survey. He meant rather that an intention to appropriate might be so treated which manifested itself by a formal return into the land office of a survey, which, though only made on paper, was nevertheless sufficient to give notice to the world, and was one of the recognized modes of locating land warrants; and herein he is sustained by a cloud of authorities. Whatever doubts may once have existed in regard to the validity of chamber surveys, full effect has been given to them by modern decisions, where time enough has elapsed since their return to raise a legal presumption. This presumption has all the effect of a legal conclusion, and is presumptio juris et de jure. That is to say, after one-and-twenty years the law treats all surveys duly returned into the land office as actual surveys, though no compass was set or chain stretched upon the land. Thus the intended appropriation of the surveyor becomes in the highest sense an actual appropriation. We cannot doubt that the learned judge meant to be understood by the jury and was understood as using the word intended in the sense above indicated, and that he did not mean that a mere unexecuted purpose of a surveyor could, under any circumstances, become a survey." McBarron v. Gilbert, 42 Pa. St. 279.

Intended Husband. — The words "intended

Deed. — A building estate was offered for sale in plots. The deed to a plot contained restrictive agreements as to the use and occupation, and recited that it was intended that all future contracts for the sale of the plots should contain the same restrictive agreements. It was held that the recital in the deed was not a mere expression of intention which the vendors were at liberty to change, but the effect of the deed was that the vendors thereby entered into a covenant not to authorize the use of the unsold plots in a manner inconsistent with the conditions of the building scheme as therein expressed; that even if the deed had not the effect of a covenant by the vendors, yet the trustees were bound by a contract implied from the whole transaction, restricting their dealing with the land in violation of the building scheme; and that an injunction restraining them from authorizing any purchaser to build contrary to the building scheme should be granted. Mackenzie v. Childers, 43 Ch. D. 265.

Id. 350 (*299), citing Lube Eq. 343."

2. Intent — Intention. — Referred to an act, it denotes the state of mind with which the act is done. State v. Tom, 2 Jones L. (N. Car.) 416.

It is the exercise of intelligent will, the mind being fully aware of the nature and consequences of the act which is about to be done, and with such knowledge and with full liberty of action willing and electing to do it. Smith v. State, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 619.

An intention is defined as a fixed direction of the meaning to a particular object, or a determination to act in a particular manner. Willis v. Jolliffe, 11 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 489.

In Smith v. State, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 619, it was said: "Webster defines intent to mean a design, a purpose, intention, meaning, drift, aim. Burrill defines it to be 'the presence of will in the act which consummates a crime. It is the exercise of intelligent will, the mind being fully aware of the nature and consequences of the act which is about to be done, and with such knowledge and with full liberty of action willing and electing to do it.'"

In State v. McDonald, 4 Port. (Ala.) 458, it was said: "To intend must be understood to mean the same with 'design' or 'contemplate.'" See also Christian v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 143 Mo. 460.

Intent and Intention. — An indictment charging that an assault was made with an intention to ravish, instead of intent, is good. State v. Tom, 2 Jones L. (N. Car.) 414. The court said: "In Walker's Dictionary the two primary definitions of these words are the same, to wit, 'design,' 'purpose.' Can the court say then that a charge of a felonious assault made with the intention to commit a rape, i. e., with the design or purpose to commit a rape, is different from a charge of an assault made with the intent to commit a rape, i. e., with a design or purpose to commit a rape? The bare statement of the proposition shows its absurdity."

Intention and Act — Life Insurance. (See also the title LIFE INSURANCE.) — A policy provided that if the insured came to his death by his own act and intention, the company should be liable only for the net value of the policy at the time. In construing this policy the court said: "While the words 'his own act and intention' have been construed to mean no more than the words 'his own act,' on the ground that the word 'act' necessarily implies intention (Chapman v. Republic L. Ins. Co., 5 Big. Ins. Cas. 110, 6 Biss. (U. S.) 238), yet the addition of the word intention shows that the parties were solicitous to avoid all question as to whether the policy was to be avoided by the physical act simply of the assured when unaccompanied by any corresponding intellectual purpose or act of the mind." Adkins v. Columbia L. Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 31.

Intention and Promise Distinguished. — The trial court instructed: "An intention is but the purpose a man forms in his own mind; a promise is an express undertaking or agreement to carry that purpose into effect, and must be express, in contradistinction to a promise implied from an acknowledgment of the justness or existence of the debt." The appellate court said: "This charge, as applied to the case, viz., debts discharged by bankruptcy, we think is entirely correct." Shockey v. Mills, 71 Ind. 292.

INTENTIONAL. (See also the titles INTEND, ante, p. 979; INTENTION,

In Stewart v. Reckless, 24 N. J. L. 430, it was said: "The expression of an intention to do a thing is not a promise to do it. An intention is but the purpose a man forms in his own mind; a promise is an express undertaking or agreement to carry the purpose into effect. The intention may begin and end with the person who forms it. A promise, supported by a good consideration, can only be rescinded by the act of both the parties to it, for to make a binding promise there must be a promisee as well as a promisor."

Intent and Belief. — Where, in order to arrest on mesne process, a plaintiff was required to make affidavit that "he has reason to believe that the defendant is likely to remove beyond the jurisdiction of the court," an affidavit that he had reason to believe that the defendant "intends to leave the state" was held insufficient. The court said: "A person may intend to do what there is no likelihood that he will do. And one person may safely swear that he has reason to believe that another intends to do an act which he has no reason to believe it is likely that the other will do." Wood v. Melius, 8 Allen (Mass.) 434.

The testimony of a defendant upon a charge of a felonious assault that he intended to defend himself is not equivalent to testimony that he believed himself in peril of life or limb. Duncan v. State, 84 Ind. 204.

Intent and Motive Distinguished. — In State v. David, 131 Mo. 397, it was said: "It seems to be a confusion of the necessary intent with 'motive.' The distinction is clear. It devolves upon the state to show the intent. If the jury believed, as they have said by their verdict they did, that defendant knowingly and wilfully gave the deceased a drink of whiskey with sufficient strychnine in it to kill him, they were bound to find that he intended the natural consequence of his act, to wit, death by poison; but can it be maintained that, though they found he accomplished the death of his victim by this intentional act, it was no crime, because, forsooth, they could not discern the motive therefor? The motives for crime are so numerous, so hidden, and often so utterly unreasonable, that it is impracticable to require that they shall always be made manifest. The fact of motive or the absence of motive is always an important inquiry in a case of this character, but the absence of an apparent motive is not conclusive of the innocence of the defendant."

The judge refused to charge the jury that "if they believe that the prisoner had no motive for killing the deceased, as shown by words or deeds previous or subsequent to the act, then they must acquit him on the ground of want of criminal intent," and instead charged that "the intent must exist and be shown to exist, but the motive may not be discovered; the absence of a motive revealed is a circumstance to be duly considered in weighing the question of guilt." It was held that in this there was no error. State v. Coleman, 20 S. Car. 452. See also as to this distinction, Willis v. Jolliffe, 11 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 489.

Intent and Attempt. (See also the title AT- TEMPTS TO COMMIT CRIME, vol. 3, p. 250; and see ATTEMPT, vol. 3, p. 249.) — A statute was directed against attempts to administer poison. The court said: "The act recognizes a distinction between intent and 'attempt.' The former indicates the purpose existing in the mind, the latter an act to be committed. Merely soliciting one to do an act is not an attempt to do that act. Rex v. Butler, 6 C. & P. 368, 25 E. C. L. 441; Smith v. Com., 54 Pa. St. 209. In this last case it was said: 'In a high moral sense it may be true that solicitation is attempt; but in a legal sense it is not.'" Stabler v. Com., 95 Pa. St. 321. See also Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367; State v. Marshall, 14 Ala. 411.

In Bechtelheimer v. State, 54 Ind. 133, it was said: "An intent to do a given thing is not to be confounded with an 'attempt' to do the same thing. The one may exist without taking any steps whatever toward the accomplishment of the purpose; the other implies more, for an attempt implies the taking of some such steps." This was a poisoning case.

In Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 59, it was said: "We do not deny that there is a distinction between an intent and an attempt to do anything. The former implies the purpose only; the latter, an actual effort to carry that purpose into execution."

Same — Murder. (See also the title MURDER AND MANSLAUGHTER.) — A statute provided for the punishment of a person convicted of "an assault with an attempt to murder." An indictment was upon assault with intent to murder. In holding the indictment sufficient the court said: "It is true, as contended for by the counsel for the prisoner, that there is a marked difference between the terms intent and 'attempt to kill and murder,' etc. But while this difference exists in the terms taken separately, the distinction is lost when we consider them in the connection in which they occur in the statute and in the indictment. An assault implies an attempt to do the violence; and the intent to murder characterizes the criminality of the act. An assault with an attempt to murder implies nothing less; so, we conclude, the indictment contains a sufficient description of the statutory offense." State v. Bullock, 13 Ala. 416.

Same — Rape. (See also the title RAPE.) — In State v. Martin, 3 Dev. L. (N. Car.) 330, it was said: "There can be none to denote the intent more apt than that word intent itself. It is the language of the common law, of statutes, of pleading. It is perfectly understood, and ought to be retained. It is said by Lord Ellenborough, in Rex v. Phillips, 6 East 472, to be the proper word to convey the specific allegation of intent. It is found in all the precedents within our reach; and there is no other term so expressive and precise. Here the word 'attempt' has been used in its stead. We should be justified in rejecting it upon the sole ground that it is not the word of the statute. But it is not even synonymous. Intent referred to an act denotes a state of mind with which the act is done. 'Attempt' is expressive rather of a moving towards doing the thing ante, p. 980; WILFUL.) A result may be said to be intentional when a party either knows or has good reason to believe that it will follow the act done.¹

than of the purpose itself. An attempt is an overt act itself. An assault is an 'attempt to strike,' and is very different from a mere intent to strike. The statute makes a particular intent, evinced by a particular act, the crime. That purpose and that act cannot be so well nor sufficiently described as by the words of the statute itself." To the same effect see State v. Hearsey, 50 La. Ann. 373; Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 60; Kelly v. Com., 1 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 434. But see State v. Tom, 2 Jones L. (N. Car.) 414.

In Witherby v. State, 39 Ala. 703, it was held that an indictment which charged the defendant with assault with intent to ravish was sufficient under a statute against attempts to commit rape. The court said: "The 'only distinction between an intent and an attempt to do a thing is that the former implies the purpose only, while the latter implies both the purpose and an actual effort to carry that purpose into execution.' Prince v. State, 35 Ala. 367. Therefore a mere intent to commit a particular offense does not involve an attempt to do it. But an 'assault with intent to commit a rape' is of itself an attempt to commit the offense." Citing State v. Bullock, 13 Ala. 473.

And for intent and "attempt" used synonymously, see Griffin v. State, 26 Ga. 493; State v. Hayes, 78 Mo. 317.

Purpose and Intent. — The expressions "with an intent" and "for a purpose" are almost identical. Com. v. Raymond, 97 Mass. 570. See also Robertson v. Liddell, 9 East 437.

Felonious. (See also FELONIOUS — FELONIOUSLY, vol. 12, p. 1029.) — In Matter of Mutchler, 55 Kan. 164, it was said: "A felonious intent means to deprive the owner, not temporarily, but permanently, of his own property, without color of right or excuse for the act, and to convert it to the taker's use without the consent of the owner."

In People v. Moore, 37 Hun (N. Y.) 93, it was said: "Felonious intent, where used in penal statutes, means criminal intent, and criminal intent is an intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of his property."

A felonious intent is an unlawful and wicked intent. State v. Fisher, 8 Kan. 208; State v. White, 14 Kan. 538.

Larcenous. (See also the title LARCENY.) — In Wilson v. State, 18 Tex. App. 274, it was said: "Mr. Archbold defined a larcenous intent at common law thus: 'Where a man knowingly takes and carries away the goods of another, without any claim or pretense of right, with intent wholly to deprive the owner of them and to appropriate or convert them to his own use.' And Chief Justice Eyre in Pear's case [2 East P. C. 685] defined the offense thus: 'The wrongful taking of goods with intent to spoil the owner of them lucri causa.' State v. Shermer, 55 Mo. 83."

Intent to Injure — Maim. (See also the title MAYHEM.) — The intent referred to in Pen. Code Minn., § 177, may be defined to be the purpose at the time to do, without lawful authority or necessity, that which the statute forbids; and the words "intent to injure" refer to injuries of the same class specified in the statute or such as might reasonably be expected to be dangerous or to result in serious bodily harm. State v. Hair, 37 Minn. 351.

Fixtures. (See also the title FIXTURES, vol. 13, p. 597.) — As to all articles not so intimately connected with the freehold as to become essentially a part of it, the intention, not the mere physical fact of their connection with the realty, is the criterion of annexation. But the intention which thus becomes controlling is not the secret design which may dwell in a party's mind and as to whose existence he alone can speak, but that intention which was either expressly declared by the parties competent to make it the governing rule, or which flows, patent to all, from the nature and character of the act, the clear purpose to be served, the manifest relation which the articles bear to the realty, and the visible consequences of their severance upon the proper and obvious use of it. National Bank v. North, 160 Pa. St. 303.

Indictment. (See also the title INDICTMENTS, INFORMATION, and COMPLAINTS, 10 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 344.) — When the intent with which the act is committed is one of the essential elements of the offense, the word intent should be used in the indictment. Thus in State v. Goldston, 103 N. Car. 325, the court said: "The intent is the fixed purpose of the mind in connection with the assault. This the statute makes an essential element of the offense, and it — not the evidence of it — must be charged. It is possible that some other word or expression would suffice as a substitute for the word intent, as employed in the statute, but it is an expressive, precise word, well understood and much used in statutes, and it is not at all safe for pleaders to omit it in all proper connections. The charge should be, 'with intent, feloniously,' etc." Citing State v. Martin, 3 Dev. & B. L. (N. Car.) 329; State v. Scott, 72 N. Car. 461; State v. Jesse, 2 Dev. & B. L. (N. Car.) 297.

Intentionally in the Sense of Purposely. — See Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130.

"Intentionally" and "With Premeditated Design" Distinguished. — State v. Brown, 12 Minn. 490; State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132. And see the title MURDER and MANSLAUGHTER.

Intentional Injuries — Accident Insurance. — In Berger v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 88 Fed. Rep. 242, it was held that the exception did not include death from being shot by an insane person.

Intentional Violation. — Where the charter of a corporation provided that its ordinances in regard to impounding stock should not be obligatory on the persons and property of non-residents of the municipality, being citizens of the state, unless in case of intentional violation, it was held that the stock of such nonresident might be forfeited when he had knowledge of the ordinance, and knew or had good reason to believe that his stock, when turned loose on his premises, would go into the city, without showing that he had the specific intent that they should go. Knoxville

INTERCOURSE. — See SEXUAL INTERCOURSE.

INTERDICTION. (See also the title INTERNATIONAL LAW, post.) — An interdiction or suspension of commercial intercourse means, ex vi termini, an entire cessation for the time being of all trade whatever.¹

INTERESSE TERMINI. (See also the titles LANDLORD AND TENANT; LEASE.) — An interesse termini is a right to the possession of the premises at a future time; and upon an ordinary lease to commence instantly the lessee, at common law, has an interesse termini only until entry.²

v. King, 7 Lea (Tenn.) 441. See generally the titles IMPOUNDING, ante, p. 4; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Estoppel. — In Gillett v. Wiley, 126 Ill. 323, it was said: "The cases and text writers seem to use interchangeably the words 'wilfully,' intentionally, 'means,' and 'voluntarily,' as synonymous terms, in discussing the question of the making of declarations or performing acts from which it is alleged an estoppel arises."

Failure to File Report. — A statute provided that where directors of certain corporations should "intentionally neglect" to file annual reports, they should be liable for debts contracted during the period of neglect. In an action brought against the directors the court below found inter alia that "they had no active intention to violate the law," but reached the conclusion of law that "under the statute the neglect or refusal was an intentional one." This was reversed by the Supreme Court, which said: "This provision of the statute * * * cannot be construed as though the word intentionally was omitted, and yet such in effect was the construction given it by the court below in the conclusion arrived at." Breitung v. Lindauer, 37 Mich. 217.

Intentional Injury — Accident Insurance. (See also the title ACCIDENT INSURANCE, vol. 1, p. 322.) — In American Acc. Co. v. Carson, 99 Ky. 441, it was held that the term "intentional injuries" covered the death of an officer who was shot by a prisoner whom he was attempting to arrest. See also De Graw v. National Acc. Soc., 51 Hun (N. Y.) 142.

I. DEFINITIONS — 1. Interest Generally. — Interest is compensation for the use or forbearance of money, or for withholding from or depriving a party of money or that which has a pecuniary value.¹

2. Simple Interest. — Simple interest is interest on the principal sum originally loaned.²

3. Compound Interest. — Compound interest is interest upon both original principal and accruing interest, the latter being added to the principal sum, and the aggregate treated as a new principal for the calculation of interest for the next period.³

4. Legal Interest. — Legal interest is a term generally applied to the rate of interest, rather than the right to the recovery of interest in the particular case. As such, it is the rate of interest prescribed by law where the parties to the transaction have fixed none. In a broader sense, all interest which the law recognizes or permits is legal interest, illegal interest being usury.⁴

5. Conventional Interest. — Conventional interest is also a term which usually has reference to the rate. So understood it means the rate agreed upon by the parties by contract, express or implied,⁵ and may be greater or less than the legal rate of interest, provided it is not in excess of the maximum rate for which the parties are allowed by law to contract.⁶

II. ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF INTEREST — 1. Origin. — Originally interest was unquestionably compensation paid to the owner of money for its use, and the practice of taking this money hire probably sprang up among the nations of the world as their respective civilizations reached the stage where money, superseding the barter of goods, became a general medium of exchange.⁷

2. Rule of Early Common Law. — The rule of the early common law did not permit the taking of interest as compensation for the use of money,⁸ and the Interest as Damages Not Included in Common-law Definition. — In Parks v. Lubbock, 92 Tex. 635, citing 11 AM. AND ENG. ENCYC. OF LAW (1st ed.) 379, it was said that interest, as known to the common law, is defined as "a compensation, usually reckoned by a percentage, for the loan, use, or forbearance of the money," and that this definition does not embrace compensation for the detention of money beyond the time at which, by agreement, it was to be paid; that is to say, after the maturity of the debt. Therefore the parties to a contract for the payment of money might lawfully stipulate that, upon the failure of the debtor to pay at maturity, he should pay for the detention a rate in excess of what the law would allow as interest, the sum so stipulated for being treated, not as interest, but as a penalty for failing to pay at maturity; a stipulation, it was declared, the validity of which the authorities were practically unanimous in maintaining.

2. Simple Interest. — Black's L. Dict.; And. L. Dict.

3. Compound Interest. — Black's L. Dict.; And. L. Dict.

4. Legal Interest Is the Rate of Interest Established by the Law of the Country and which will prevail in the absence of express stipulation. Black's L. Dict.; Beals v. Amador County, 35 Cal. 624. But this is erroneous in so far as it states a requirement for an express stipulation as to the rate, in the absence of which interest at the legal rate will prevail. As will be seen hereafter, the right to interest as well as the rate recoverable may be regulated by implication merely, as in the case of known custom or established course of dealings between the parties. See infra, this title, Contracts to Pay Interest — Implied Contracts; Rate of Interest — Rate by Contract — Implied Contracts for Rate. See also Bouv. L. Dict.

State Papers (1st ed.) 307; 2 Black. Com. 454.

Another Statement of Common-law Rule — No Interest in Absence of Contract. — In several American cases it is said that the common-law rule was that no interest could be recovered in the absence of contract. Fowler v. Harts, 149 practice was likewise condemned by the law of the ecclesiastics.¹ It seems to have been held by the church to be actually sinful, and by the courts to have been unlawful from the political reason that money, being only a medium of exchange, was naturally barren and unproductive.²

3. Interest under Statutes of Hen. VIII. and Anne. — The first English statute on the subject of interest was 37 Hen. VIII., c. 9. This statute fixed the lawful rate of interest at ten per cent. and visited the receipt of more with forfeiture and imprisonment. By the statute of 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 16, the rate of interest which might be lawfully contracted for in England was reduced to five per cent.³

4. Evolution and Development of Laws of Interest — a. IN GENERAL. — It may safely be stated that there is no subject in the law with reference to which there is greater conflict and confusion in the cases than that of interest.⁴ The history of interest law, whether allowed by virtue of contract or as damages, is one of an evolution and development by no means gradual, logical, or symmetrical. It is punctuated here and there by legislative enactments, which in some instances, but by no means in all, have served to simplify or render more certain and fixed the principles regulating this very important branch of jurisprudence. Again, in the history of this subject there are landmarks in the way of judicial decisions, themselves amounting practically to legislation, but which still leave the subject in a most unsettled state. It is not until comparatively recent times that the cases have approached anything like harmony, or, it might be said, have evinced a clear comprehension or discriminating understanding of the several distinct principles on which the allowance of interest may properly depend.⁵

b. SURVEY OF ENGLISH DECISIONS. — The conflict of English authority

Ill. 592; Dodge v. Perkins, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 368; Perry v. Taylor, 1 Utah 66. But these cases, it is apprehended, refer to the American common law, and not to the English common law; the former, it is generally held, including such statutes as those of Henry VIII. and Anne, which were enacted prior to the colonization of America and were not local in their operation to England nor repugnant to the spirit of American institutions. The English common-law rule is believed to be as stated above.

1. Rule of Ecclesiastical Law. — Lowe v. Waller, 2 Dougl. 736; Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 359, 72 Am. Dec. 102, 2 Black. Com. 454, citing Decretals, l. 5, tit. 19.

2. Reasons for Disallowance of Interest Stated and Fallacies Pointed Out. — Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 359, 72 Am. Dec. 102; 2 Black. Com. 454.

3. Interest under English Statutes. — Lowe v. Waller, 2 Dougl. 736; Commonwealth Nat. Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 438; Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 359, 72 Am. Dec. 102; Jefferson's Am. State Papers (1st ed.) 307. And see Nashua, etc., R. Corp. v. Boston, etc., R. Corp., 61 Fed. Rep. 237.

Policy of Statute 37 Hen. VIII., c. 9. — It may be questioned whether the statute 37 Hen. VIII., c. 9, was the result of more enlightened views as to the justice, honesty, or advantages of letting money at interest, or was rather the dictate of policy that as the vice could not be suppressed it should be tolerated, but with many and severe restrictions. Adrian v. Brooks, 13 Tex. 279.

Statutes Negative in Character. — The statute 37 Hen. VIII., c. 9, with reference to interest, and most of the succeeding statutes of England on the subject, are negative in character. They sanction interest indirectly by declaring that not more than a specified per cent. shall be taken for the loan of money or other commodity. They do not declare affirmatively in what cases interest shall be taken, nor do they positively require its payment in any case. Adrian v. Brooks, 13 Tex. 279.

4. Conflict in Cases Noted. — Elbert, C. J., in Hawley v. Barker, 5 Colo. 118; White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 394, 34 Am. Rep. 544.

Confusion in Use of Terms. — It has been said that the conflict in the cases on the subject of interest is not so much in regard to principle as in the mode of expression. The contest has been whether the allowance should or should not be made; and the name by which it should be called, whether interest or compensation for delay, measured by the rate of interest, receiving little attention, it has been incautiously said that interest was or was not to be allowed. The distinction, however, is important, and failure to observe it leads to great confusion. Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. St. 37; Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37.

5. "The Tendency of Courts in Modern Times" has been to extend the right to recover interest on demand far beyond the limits within which that right was originally confined. What seemed to be the demands of justice did not permit the principle to remain stationary, and hence it has been for years in a state of constant evolution. This, in some measure, accounts for many of the apparently contradictory views to be found in the adjudged cases." O'Brien, J., in Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817.

on the question of interest has been the subject of special comment.¹ From the clearest view ascertainable from the cases it appears that the rule of 37 Hen. VIII., allowing interest where contracted for, not to exceed a prescribed rate, was extended to cases of implied contracts as well as to those where the contract was express, including mercantile securities, where an undertaking to pay interest would be implied from the usage of trade, and cases where a similar undertaking might be presumed from the course of dealings between the parties.² In the absence of these conditions, interest was not allowed in an action for money lent, or for money had and received, or for money paid, or on an account stated, or for goods sold, or for work and labor, even though to be paid for on a particular day.³ In some cases, however, the doctrine of implied contracts to pay interest does not seem to have been confined to mercantile instruments, or where there is a pre established course of dealings from which an undertaking to pay interest may be presumed, these cases inclining to the position that wherever there is a definite sum of money due, interest should be allowed from the date of default.⁴ Interest has also been allowed, in the discretion of the jury, as damages for the detention of the principal sum.⁵

c. CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN CASES. — The Canadian cases on the subject of interest are, of course, controlled to a large extent by English precedents. But a tendency to a greater liberality in the allowance of interest is observable in the Canadian courts.⁶

d. REVIEW OF AMERICAN AUTHORITIES — (1) General Outline. — In the United States the courts seem, from the outset, to have viewed the allowance of interest with greater favor than the courts of England.⁷ In the first place, the courts of the United States were, from the beginning, able to consider the subject free from the taint of the prejudice of the ancient common and ecclesiastical law. There was never, with them, any doubt about the recovery of interest when expressly contracted for, or where an undertaking to pay it might be implied from a usage of trade, as in the case of mercantile securities, or from the previous course of dealings between the parties. But in addition to this, interest has been more readily allowed in the courts of the American Union, either upon an implication regarded as arising from the mere delay in the payment of a money debt,¹ or specifically as damages for the nonpayment of a debt due.²

(2) Interest on Unliquidated Demands. — Until a comparatively recent time interest was not allowed on unliquidated demands;³ but this is no longer an invariable rule, and interest on unliquidated damages for the breach of contract or for tort is frequently allowed, in some instances indeed only in the discretion of the jury, but in others strictly as of right, as part of the compensation to which the injured party is entitled.⁴

(3) Limits of Rule. — Most of the modern authorities restrict the allowance of interest in actions for damages to cases where the damages are calculable with reference to pecuniary standards of fixed and reasonably certain values,⁵ and hold that interest is not allowable unless the party to be charged could have ascertained, by computation or otherwise, the amount for which he was liable.⁶ The same rule has been applied to actions of tort for personal injuries where the damages are wholly or largely within the discretion of the jury;⁷ and also in the case of injury to or destruction of property, the rule allowing damages in the form of interest on the value of the property has been limited to injury to such property or property right as has a fixed or certain value.⁸ Some cases, however, are not restrained by these considerations, and hold, apparently, that interest, at least from the institution of the suit, is recoverable in any action in which a money judgment is recovered. A further consideration of these principles and the cases supporting them will be found in other portions of this article.¹

c. RULE UNDER MODERN STATUTES — (1) English Statutes — Act 3 and 4 Wm. IV. — This act (c. 42, § 28) provided, in substance, that interest was recoverable, in the discretion of the jury, on all debts or sums certain, payable by virtue of a written instrument at a certain time, from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable;² or, if not payable by virtue of a written instrument and at a time certain, "then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing, so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the time of payment;³ provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable by law." The statute also provided that in actions of trover and trespass de bonis asportatis, and in actions upon policies of insurance, the jury might, in its discretion, allow interest as part of the recovery.⁴

(2) Enactments of the Several States — (a) In General. — In the several states of the American Union the allowance of interest is largely regulated and controlled by legislative enactment.⁵

(b) Doctrine that Interest Is Solely Creature of Statute. — It has often been said that interest is solely a creature of statute, and can never be allowed in the absence of statutory sanction;⁶ but this does not exclude a recovery of interest where

2. A Written Application for a Loan until a Fixed Day is not an instrument by virtue of which money is payable within the statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 42, § 28, so as to enable a jury to give interest as damages, though the loan is made on the terms of the application. Taylor v. Holt, 3 H. & C. 452, 34 L. J. Exch. 1, 13 W. R. 78, 11 L. T. What Is Time Certain under Statute. — A sum certain payable under a written instrument at a stated time after death is a sum payable at a certain time within 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 42, § 28, and therefore carries interest after the period fixed for payment has expired. In re Horner, 65 L. J. Ch. 694 (1896) 2 Ch. 188, 74 L. T. N. S. 686, 44 W. R. 556; Knapp v. Burnaby, 9 W. R. 765.

Where the Time for the Payment of Freight Was Fixed by a Charter-party at two months after the date of the ship's return report at the custom house, it was held that interest on the amount of the freight was not recoverable, the principal sum not being payable at a time certain. Merchant Shipping Co. v. Armitage, L. R. 9 Q. B. 99. And see generally on this question London, etc., R. Co. v. South Eastern R. Co., (1892) 1 Ch. 120, 61 L. J. Ch. 294, 65 L. T. N. S. 722, 40 W. The Contract Between a Railway Company and a Contractor provided that payments should be made monthly as the work progressed, on the certificates of the company's engineer. There was no stipulation in the contract with reference to the payment of interest, but the contractor made demand in writing for a sum as the balance due to him, and claimed interest thereon. The contractor's accounts were disputed, and on the bill filed by him against the company the result showed the complainant to be entitled to a balance less than one-half the sum which he claimed. It was held that the contractor was not entitled to interest under the statute above referred to, the demand in writing for payment not being of a sum certain payable at a certain time. Hill v. South Staffordshire R. Co., L. R. 18 Eq. 154.

expressly contracted for, though the governing statute may not in terms provide for interest under such circumstances,¹ and a distinction, in the present connection, has been taken between interest eo nomine and interest as damages, interest being frequently given in the latter case, it is said, though no statutory provision is made therefor.²

(e) Actions under Special Statutes Making No Provision for Interest. — Where an action is brought under a statute creating a special liability, in which the subject of interest is ignored, the general rule is that interest is not recoverable,³ as in case of a statutory demand against a county,⁴ or a claim under a statute imposing liability for injuries on highways,⁵ or making railroad companies absolutely liable for stock killed,⁶ or the owners of stock liable for injuries done by cattle trespassing,⁷ or giving damages for the nonpayment of a foreign bill of exchange,⁸ or imposing a penalty for the violation of a statute regulating railroad rates.⁹

The Reason of the Rule laid down in these cases is that the particular statute under which the action is brought prescribes and limits the measure of dam-

The former case was an action under a statute making a railroad liable for the value of stock killed by its negligence, or at a point where its track might have been fenced and was not fenced. ages, excluding, therefore, a recovery of interest,¹ and this reason is especially strong where the damages are not restricted to compensation merely, but double or treble damages are given, or something is awarded in addition to the value of the property destroyed.²

(d) Provision as to Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay. — The statutes of several states make special provision for interest where the circumstances under which money is withheld constitute unreasonable and vexatious delay.³ Mere delay, however, is not sufficient to bring a case within such a statute, but the debtor must have actively obstructed the collection or by some device of his own have induced the creditor to delay collection;⁴ and it must also appear that the delay was both unreasonable and vexatious. The fact that it was unreasonable or vexatious will not suffice.⁵

Detention of Proceeds of Property Converted. — But in a jurisdiction where interest is held to be solely a creature of statute, and the statute makes no provision in terms for the recovery of interest in cases of trespass to property, it has been held that where personal property is taken and converted into money the defendant may be required to pay interest thereon as for money vexatiously and unreasonably withheld.⁶

Interest from Time When Delay Became Unreasonable and Vexatious. — A person guilty of unreasonable and vexatious delay in making payment of a just claim cannot be relieved by offering to pay interest from the time when the delay began to be unreasonable and vexatious; he is chargeable with interest from the time when the payment became due. But it is no objection to the recovery of interest under such a statute that the amount due is not stated in the writing and is undetermined.¹

(3) Construction and Operation — (a) General Rules of Construction Applicable. — Of course, in the construction of interest enactments, the general rules of statutory interpretation apply without exception.² Thus, it has been held, a statute allowing any agreed rate of interest should be strictly construed as in derogation of the common law;³ and where the legislature has enumerated a variety of cases in which creditors shall be allowed to receive interest, the presumption arises that it was not intended to permit its recovery in cases not enumerated.⁴

(b) Not Retrospective in Operation. — While it is competent for the lawmaking power to impose on debtors the obligation of paying interest after the passage of the act on debts already due,⁵ a retrospective effect will not be given to interest enactments. They are permitted to operate only on the future rights of the parties.⁶

(4) Constitutionality. — Interest laws are within the provisions contained in many of the state constitutions that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation,⁷ and in some jurisdictions the legislatures are expressly forbidden to pass any local or special law establishing the rate of interest.⁸

Bent Due under a Lease which provides for the payment of rent in instalments monthly in advance is within the clause of the statute referred to, and each instalment will bear interest from the date when due, though the amount of the rent is not stated in the lease. Heissler v. Stose, 131 Ill. 393.

Interest Charged by Pawnbrokers. — A statute fixing the rate of interest which may be charged by pawnbrokers is not in violation of Const. Cal., art. 1, § 11, which provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Jackson v. Shawl, 29 Cal. 267. And see Smith v. Judge, 17 Cal. 554; Ex p. Andrews, 18 Cal. 680; French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 544.

The Territorial Legislatures are forbidden by Act of Congress to pass local or special laws regulating the rate of interest on money. Act Cong. July 30, 1886, 24 U. S. Stat. at L. 170, c. 818; Hotchkiss v. Marion, 12 Mont. 218.

Provision Limited to Contracts Between Individuals. — The provision of the Louisiana Constitution (now Const. 1898, art. 48) prohibiting the General Assembly from passing any local or special law fixing the rate of interest exclusively applies to contracts between individuals. The right of a municipal corporation to enforce the payment of a license tax by the imposition of a penalty in the name of interest for delinquency is not affected by that provision. New Orleans v. Firemen's Ins. Co., 41 La. Ann. 1142.

Certificates for Municipal Improvements. — It has been held that a city charter which authorizes the city to make certificates issued to contractors for municipal improvements bear a different rate of interest from that prescribed by the constitution, is in contravention of the constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from passing any local or special law establishing a rate of interest. Bayha v. Carter, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 1.

rate of interest or abrogating or suspending the right to interest are considered elsewhere.¹

III. GROUNDS OF ALLOWANCE OF INTEREST — 1. In General. — The grounds on which interest is allowed are: (1) by virtue of a contract to pay it; (2) as damages;² (3) according to some authorities, that the conduct of a party merits its allowance against him, as for some misconduct, breach of trust, or dereliction of duty;³ and (4) that one person has in his possession, without right, funds belonging to another and actually makes interest thereon.⁴ In the last case the allowance is somewhat analogous to the doctrine of accession in the case of personalty.

2. Doctrine that Equity Follows the Law. — It is frequently stated in the present connection that equity follows the law in the allowance of interest.⁵ And it is equally true at the present time that courts of law are frequently influenced by broadly equitable considerations in the allowance of interest as damages.⁶ It has been held, however, that courts of equity are not actually limited in the allowance of interest by the statute of 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 42, § 28.⁷

IV. CONTRACTS TO PAY INTEREST — 1. In General. — A contract by virtue of which interest is recoverable may be either express or implied.⁸ Interest made payable by contract, it has been said, becomes part of the debt itself,⁹ and is not merely damages for the detention of the money.¹⁰ But this must be taken with the qualification that interest is recoverable strictly as interest only during the continuance of the contract and as provided by its terms, before breach, and not after.¹¹ except perhaps under the rule of the early common law, that interest is recoverable where there is an express contract to pay it. And where interest is expressly contracted for there may be a recovery strictly according to the terms of the contract, unless, of course, the contract be illegal or usurious, or there is some ground, common to all contracts, for relieving against it in equity.¹

b. WRITTEN CONTRACTS — (1) In General. — By statute in many of the states it is provided that a contract for the payment of interest at a rate higher than the legal rate, in the absence of a conventional rate, must, to be valid, be evidenced by a written agreement.²

(2) Object of Requirement. — It has been said that the object of such statutes is to avoid ambiguity that would otherwise exist on the face of an instrument calling for interest and mentioning no rate, and to conform to the rule rejecting parol evidence to affect writings.³

(3) Requisites — (a) Contract to Specify Rate. — It is, in general, requisite that contracts to pay more than the legal rate of interest should specify the rate contracted for.⁴

(b) Rate to Appear in Contract for Principal Debt. — In some jurisdictions the statute contemplates that a stipulation for interest at a rate higher than the legal rate should appear in the contract for the principal debt.⁵ But there is authority for the position that any valid written contract for interest will be upheld, though collateral to that providing for the principal.⁶

(c) Interest Included in Principal Sum. — An exception to the general rule just adverted to, that the contract for interest at a rate higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract must specify the rate agreed upon, exists in cases where the interest has been computed in advance and appears in the contract as part of the principal sum. In such instances it is necessary only that the

4. Contract Should Specify Rate. — See the statutes of the several states.

Interest Payments Indorsed on Note. — The fact that the maker of a note which by its terms bore no interest paid interest thereon for a time after maturity at a rate higher than the legal rate, which payments were indorsed on the note, does not satisfy the statutory requirement for an agreement in writing, nor bind the maker to pay such rate in future. *Haydenville Sav. aggregate amount to be paid, including the interest, should be clearly expressed in the contract.⁴

(4) Construction — (a) In General. — Contracts for interest are governed by the same rules of construction and interpretation as are other contracts.⁵ Thus the rule that the manifest intent of the parties must control is applicable.⁶ So also the terms of the contract must, if possible, be construed to mean something rather than nothing at all;⁴ and where the terms of a contract to pay interest leave its interpretation doubtful, the construction to be adopted is that which will operate most strongly against the party agreeing to pay interest.⁵

Omission of Word "Interest." — In a number of cases the point has been made that the terms of the contract alleged to be for interest did not contain the word "interest" at all. But where the context will warrant the construction that interest was intended, the word will, in general, be supplied, and the contract will be enforced accordingly.⁶

Omission of Period by Which Computation to Be Made. — Another frequent defect in contracts to pay interest has been the inadvertent omission of any period with reference to which the per centum is to be computed. As a general rule, in the absence of evidence of a contrary intent appearing in the contract, the construction will be that the parties intended to agree upon the stated rate as a per annum compensation, and not for any longer or shorter period.⁷

(b) Whether Construction for Court or Jury. — It has been held to be the province of the court to construe a contract for a stated rate of interest, as though

Abbreviations in a Contract for Interest will, of course, take their ordinary, usual, and accepted meaning. Thus the abbreviation cent. for centum is of the same effect as if the word were written out. Durant v. Murdock, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 114. And the abbreviations "Int. @ 6 % p. a.," in a note, signify that the note is to draw interest from date at the rate of six per cent. per annum. Belford v. Beatty, 145 Ill. 414, affirming 46 Ill. 6. Omission of Word "Interest." — Thus a note stipulating for "twenty-four per cent. per annum after maturing, as compensation and damage for nonpayment," imports a promise to pay twenty-four per cent. interest per annum upon the principal sum named in the note, after its maturity, if not then paid. Davis v. Rider, 53 Ill. 416. See also Thompson v. Hoagland, 65 Ill. 310; Higley v. Newell, 28 Iowa 516.

7. Omission of Period for Computation. — Durant v. Murdock, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 114; Griffith v. Furry, 30 Ill. 251; Williams v. Baker, 67 Ill. 238; Finley v. Acock, 9 Mo. 841.

Thus a note dated March 21, 1822, promising to pay a specified sum, being for "money loaned at forty per cent. until paid," was held to be sufficiently explicit as to the agreement of the borrower to pay interest at the rate of forty per cent. per annum. Loury v. Loury, Walk, (Mass.) 207.

It is provided by Statute in some states that where a contract prescribes a rate of interest without stipulating the period of time by which such rate is to be calculated, it is to be deemed an annual rate. Civ. Code Cal., § 1916; Rogers v. Jones, 92 Cal. 80.

reading such rate "per annum."¹ But in one case, at least, the question seems to have been regarded as one of contractual intent, for the determination of the jury.²

(c) Parol Evidence. — It has been held that parol evidence of the intention of the parties as to interest at the execution of a note is not admissible in an action thereon.³

(d) When Interest Payable. — The general rule is, in the absence of a contrary stipulation in the contract, that interest is not due and payable until the maturity of the principal debt.⁴ Nor, it has been held, will this rule be varied by the fact that there has been a voluntary payment in advance of part of the interest stipulated for.⁵

Where a Note Is Given Payable in Instalments, "with interest on said sum," no interest is due upon the last instalment until the instalment becomes due.⁶

If the Contract So Provides, however, there may be a recovery of interest as it periodically falls due,⁷ before the maturity of the principal.

c. VERBAL CONTRACTS. — In the absence of statutory requirement there is no rule of law requiring that a contract for the payment of interest shall be in writing.⁸ Thus, under statutes requiring that a contract for a rate of interest higher than the legal rate shall be written, it is uniformly held that such a contract, though oral, will be valid to the extent of the rate prescribed by law.⁹

3. Implied Contracts — a. IN GENERAL. — Interest may be recovered by Patent Ambiguity. — A patent ambiguity in the terms of a contract to pay interest is not susceptible of explanation by parol evidence. Griffith v. Furry, 30 Ill. 251.

Where a Note Bears No Interest on Its Face, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that it was intended to bear interest during the payee's lifetime. Beaver v. Slear, 182 Pa. St. 213.

Nor is parol evidence admissible to prove that when a certificate of deposit containing no stipulation as to interest was issued, the bank agreed that it should bear interest. Read v. Attica Bank, 124 N. Y. 671.

Parol Evidence to Vary Rate. — Likewise parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a note bearing a stipulated per centum interest by its terms was by agreement to bear only a lower rate. Davis v. Stout, 126 Ind. 12, 22 Am. St. Rep. 565; Smith v. Smith, 33 S. Car. 210.

Custom as Affecting Express Contract. — The mere existence of a general custom to charge interest under circumstances similar to those disclosed will not be sufficient to charge the debtor with interest where the terms of a written contract between the parties neither make express provision for interest nor contain any facts which will warrant an inference that the parties intended that the indebtedness should bear interest. Webb v. Bailey, 89 Iowa 747.

Similarly it has been held that evidence that other depository banks paid interest on moneys deposited in like manner with them has no tendency to show an implied contract that the defendant had in any manner become bound to long established, generally acquiesced in, and well known, applies to the usage of merchants in paying interest.¹

General Custom — Particular Usage. — There is a distinction with reference to the implication of a contract for interest between a general custom of merchants and the usage of a particular trade.² In the first instance a knowledge of such custom and a contemplation of it as affecting the contract will be presumed on the part of the contracting parties,³ whereas in the case of the usage of a particular trade, knowledge of it is not presumed, nor, in the absence of knowledge, is a contract with reference to it implied.⁴

(b) Mercantile Instruments. — In the case of mercantile instruments a contract to pay interest may be implied by law from usage of trade.⁵

(c) Liquidated Accounts. — Where it is a usage of trade that interest shall be charged on the balance of accounts after a certain time or after liquidation or statement, the parties will be deemed to have dealt in contemplation thereof, and interest will be allowed.⁶

(2) Custom or Course of Dealings of Parties — (a) In General. — Another ground of implication of a contract to pay interest may arise from a custom or usage of the parties or from an established course of dealings between pay such interest; nor was it sufficient as proof of a custom, as the agreement under which the defendant received the deposits was specific, including terms which constructively excluded the obligation to pay interest. New York v. Tradesmen's Nat. Bank, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 11 N. Y. Supp. 95.

Custom as Affected by Cessation of Commercial Intercourse. — The usage to add interest at the end of the year to an annual account and to charge interest on the balance does not apply to a case in which the commercial intercourse between the countries in which the parties respectively reside had ceased when the account was transmitted. Denniston v. Imbrie, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 396.

Custom of Compounding Interest. — In Graham v. Williams, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 257, 16 Am. Dec. 569, it was held that the practice by a store keeper of balancing his books at the end of each year and charging interest on the balance of a running account upon which there has been no settlement is illegal; and it was intimated that such practice would be illegal even though known to the customer. See also infra, this title, Compound Interest and Interest on Interest.

Judicial Notice of Custom for Interest. — The custom of merchants in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia to charge interest on their accounts after six months has been held a matter for judicial recognition in Pennsylvania. *Watt v. Vermont. — Raymond v. Isham, 8 Vt. 263; Davis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 52.

Interest on Yearly Balances. — In some jurisdictions the rule is that on book accounts where no other understanding or agreement is shown interest is allowed only on the yearly balances. Von Hemert v. Porter, 11 Met. (Mass.) 219; Davis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 52. This rule, however, does not prevent an understanding or agreement between the parties by which interest on each item from the time when it is entered may be charged. Willard v. Pinard, 65 Vt. 160.

Interest from Date of Expiration of Credit. — It has been held that interest is recoverable on goods sold on credit from the date at which the credit expired, where such is the usage of trade at the place where the goods are sold, although there may have been no previous dealings between the parties, no engagement to pay interest, and no notice under the statute that interest would be claimed. Bannerman v. Fullerton, 5 Nova Scotia 200.

them.¹ Thus a merchant whose custom it is after a limited period of credit to charge interest on goods sold may charge interest accordingly against those who are in the habit of dealing with him.²

Implication Negatived. — But as an undertaking to pay interest may be implied from the custom of the parties or the course of dealings between them, so also such an implication may be negatived in the same manner.³

(b) Knowledge of Custom. — Where a usage or custom of the creditor to charge interest on the accounts of those dealing with him is relied on, evidence of prior dealings or proof that the debtor had knowledge of the particular custom must be given.⁴

(c) Question of Fact for Jury. — Whether knowledge of the custom to charge interest exists in any particular case, so that the defendant may be held to have contracted with reference to it, is a proper question for the jury.⁵ But when all the circumstances, including the usages of trade and the course of dealings, are agreed by the parties or found by the jury, then the law arising from them is to be declared by the court.⁶

(3) Particular Acts of Parties or Terms of Particular Contract — (a) In General. — A contract to pay interest may also be implied from the acts of the parties themselves or from the terms of the particular contract, considered in connection with the subject-matter of the transaction.⁷

An Express Agreement for Interest in Excess of the Legal Rate in the absence of contract on a particular occasion of the advance of money by one party to another has been held to raise no presumption of a contract to pay interest at the same rate on subsequent advances. Marsion v. Pioche, 8 Cal. 522.

And with Stronger Reason It Has Been Decided that under a statute requiring an express agreement for interest and excluding those which are implied, the fact that the parties allowed ten per cent. on some prior balances is not sufficient to show an express agreement for that rate on subsequent accounts. *Western Union R. The Assumption to Pay a Substituted Obligation from which interest grows implies the payment of such interest although not stipulated eo nomine.¹ But the mere fact that the defendant, at the request of a third party, transferred to the credit of the plaintiff a balance due to such third party upon which, by the course of dealings between the defendant and such third party, interest would have been allowed, has been held to raise no contract by implication to pay interest to the new creditor.²

(b) No Implication for Interest or Implication Not to Pay It. — As a matter of course, the acts of the parties and the terms of the particular contract from which an implication of intent not to charge or pay interest may arise are proper subjects for consideration, and where such is the obvious or most reasonable construction, no interest is recoverable. And where the party seeking an allowance of interest may rely on an implied promise for its recovery, he must establish sufficient facts to support the implication.³

(4) Breach of Contract to Pay Money. — According to the doctrine of some cases, the law implies on the part of the debtor a contract to pay interest upon the failure to perform an obligation for the payment of a money debt,⁴ an implication created, it has been said, because in such cases justice to the creditor cannot be done without it.⁵ This is believed, however, to be an

Failure to Object to Notice of Charge. — The mere fact that a party to whom has been rendered an account upon which is a notice that interest will be charged after one year's credit, does not make objection thereto, has been held insufficient evidence of a promise to pay the interest charged therein. In re Edwards, 61 L. J. Ch. 22, 65 L. T. N. S. 453.

Deposit of Title Deeds. — Where a simple contract debt has been secured by the deposit of title deeds unaccompanied by any stipulation as to interest, or by any memorandum from the terms of which the exclusion of the right to recover interest can be implied, the mortgagee is entitled to interest on the debt. Carey v. Doyne, 5 Ir. Ch. R. 104; In re Kerr, L. R. 8 Eq. 331. And see Chester v. Jumel, 125 N. Y. 255.

Implication of Contract to Pay from Payment. — It has been held that the existence of a contract to pay ten per cent. interest on a note bearing only six per cent. by its terms will not be implied from the payment by the maker to the indorser before maturity of ten per cent. interest for a number of years in pursuance of a voluntary promise to do so, in the absence of any consideration to support such promise. *Andrews v. It was said that there was a distinction in respect to interest between verbal and written contracts, the latter bearing interest, but not the former. See also Ryan v. Baldrick, 3 McCord L. (S. Car.) 498.

erroneous theory. That is, the law does not imply a contract to pay interest upon the breach of a contract for the payment of money, but rather, under such circumstances, allows interest as damages and the very measure of damages for the breach.¹

V. INTEREST AS DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — 1. Contracts to Pay Money — a. IN GENERAL. — Though some cases have held that interest on money due by contract is recoverable as on an implied contract to pay it — that is, that an implied contract to pay interest arises on the breach of a contract to pay money — the sounder theory is believed to be that interest in such cases is recoverable as damages for the breach of the contract.²

b. EXPRESS CONTRACTS TO PAY MONEY — (1) In General. — Although, as already observed, the early doctrine was different,³ the general rule at present undoubtedly is that on the breach of an express contract to pay money interest is allowable as damages to the person to whom the money is due.⁴ Many of the cases, it is true, do not specifically declare that interest is given in the particular instance as damages for breach of the contract, though upon analysis this principle may be shown to be the only one involved upon which interest could have been given. It may be stated as a general rule that Interest as Damages Whether Contract Oral or Written. — "Both reason and authority say that if, by the terms of the contract, whether oral or written, a debt be due at a certain time, then it by law carries interest from that time, in the absence of any agreement otherwise by the parties." Henderson Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Lowell Mach. Shops, 86 Ky. 673.

where, in an action on a contract, there is no undertaking, express or implied, to pay interest, there interest is recoverable only by way of damages for the breach of the contract.¹

Interest After Breach. — A number of well-reasoned decisions are authority for the proposition that after the breach of a contract interest is never recoverable but as damages.² If, according to this theory, the parties provide when the contract is made for interest after maturity or in the event of a breach, then it would be recoverable as liquidated damages, or rather according to a liquidated measure.³ If not so contracted for, interest would, in theory, be recoverable as unliquidated damages, so far as any liquidation by the parties themselves is concerned, but according to a strict measure prescribed by law.⁴

It Is Not Necessary in Such Cases that the contract should expressly mention interest, or that there should be any contractual implication for its payment. It is sufficient that there has been a breach of an express contract to pay money, compensation for which necessarily includes interest on the debt.⁵

Rule Controlled by Stipulation or Inference. — But this rule will, of course, be controlled by a stipulation of the parties or an inference arising from the contract that no interest shall be paid on default.⁶

(2) Several Sorts of Contracts — (a) Bills of Exchange. — It has been held that interest cannot be computed on the damages allowed by statute upon a protested bill of exchange.⁷ But the contrary has also been decided.⁸

(b) Promissory Notes. — Interest on promissory notes is recovered after maturity as damages for the detention of the principal.⁹

(c) Penal Bonds — aa. IN GENERAL. — Where a bond is given in the penalty of a larger sum conditioned for the payment of a lesser, interest is recoverable on

In an Early Case on the Subject it was held that an action of debt would not lie for interest after the maturity of the contract, such interest being recoverable as damages strictly. Seaman v. Dec, 1 Vent. 198. And see Lapierre v. St. Albans, 2 Ld. Raym. 773; Williams v. Fowler, 1 Stra. 410. See also, however, observations of Lord Kenyon in Herries v. Jamieson, 5 T. R. 553, with reference to the case first above cited, expressing doubt on the point in question.

4. Analogous Rule in Case of Chattels. — The case of the breach of a contract to pay money is analogous in theory to the case of the breach of a contract whereby the complaining party is deprived for a period of the use of chattels. In such cases, the measure of damages for the simple deprivation of the use is the value of the use during the period of default. This fact, in the case of chattels, must be established by evidence of values, but in the case of money the law prescribes an arbitrary measure. See infra, this title, Rule of Interest.

bb. INTEREST IN EXCESS OF PENALTY — (aa) In General. — There is a conflict of authority as to the right of the obligee in a penal bond to recover interest beyond the penalty.³ In England the weight of authority appears to favor the negative rule,⁴ though there are cases allowing such recovery.⁵ In the United States a majority of the cases favor the doctrine that interest may, in certain cases, be recovered in excess of the penalty of a bond,⁶ and where interest is so given it is, in the view of most of the courts, awarded as damages for the detention of the debt.⁷

(bb) Principal and Surety. — There is some lack of precision in the cases over an alleged distinction between the liability of the principal and the surety in the matter of the recovery of interest beyond the penalty of a bond.⁸ But the true rule is simple; wherever the penalty becomes a debt due and payable as to the surety, he is as much liable for interest thereon as if originally the principal debtor.⁹

1. Penal Bonds. — Farquhar v. Morris, 7 T. R. 120; Hefford v. Alger, 1 Taunt. 218; Trice v. Turrentine, 13 Ired. L. (35 N. Car.) 212.

Rule under Particular Statute. — It has been held, however, that interest cannot be recovered on a bond given to secure the payment of instalments of stock in a joint-stock company, under the statute 5 Wm. IV., c. 48, though the bond is in a penal sum conditioned to secure the payment of a lesser sum at a certain day. St. John Bridge Co. v. Woodward, 3 N. Bruns. 29.

Where Bond Provides for Interest. — In an action on a bond in the penalty of one hundred and twenty pounds, conditioned for the repayment of the same sum, with lawful interest, it was held that interest was recoverable beyond the penalty, to the amount of the damages laid in the declaration. *Francis v. Interest Not Recoverable — Particular Circumstances. — In an action on a penal bond conditioned for the construction of a railroad, executed in consideration of the conveyance of certain real property, it was held that although the general rule was that where the damages equal or exceed the penalty interest is allowed on the penalty from the date of the breach, yet as the land conveyed was wholly unproductive, a judgment of the lower court denying interest on the penalty would not be disturbed. *Blewett v. Interest as Damages

(d) Lost Instruments. — There may be a recovery of interest in an action on a note or bond which has been lost or mislaid.¹
 (e) Debts of Decedents. — The death of the obligor in an interest-bearing claim for the payment of money in no wise suspends the running of interest.²
Where the Claim Is Not Interest-bearing Ex contractu, presentment to the representative and proof according to law will in general set interest running in the same manner as would a demand upon the decedent if living;³ and even though there be no contract for interest, express or implied, and the claim is of a non-interest-bearing nature, yet interest will be allowed after presentment and proof and subsequent approval by a court of probate, as upon a claim reduced to judgment.⁴

(f) Liquidated Damages. — Though a different view has been taken,⁵ it is not perceived why interest should not be allowed on a claim for liquidated damages in the same manner as upon any other liquidated demand.⁶

c. IMPLIED CONTRACTS TO PAY MONEY — (1) In General. — Among the cases involving the right of recovery of interest as damages for the breach of implied contracts to pay money, the same conflict exists as in most other branches of the subject of interest;⁷ but as a general rule, where the circumstances of the case warrant an implication of law or fact that a certain sum of money shall be paid at a certain time or on demand, interest is recoverable as damages for a breach of the implied obligation.⁸

Rule by Statute. — In some jurisdictions there are statutes providing that no interest shall be allowed against the estate of a decedent accruing after the debtor's death, unless the claim be verified and payment demanded of the personal representative within one year after his appointment. The object of such a statute is to prevent the unnecessary accumulation of interest on such demands by the delay of creditors in duly presenting, proving, and demanding payment. Croninger v. Marthen, 83 Ky. 662.

Claim Having Force and Effect of Judgment. — The approval by the probate court of a claim against the estate of a decedent which has been allowed by the administration has the force and effect of a judgment upon which interest will accrue, although the claim, being in the nature of an open account, would not carry interest before judgment. Finley v. Carothers, 9 Tex. 517, 60 Am. Dec. 179.

But in Durnford's Succession, 1 La. Ann. 92, it was held that where a judgment of the Supreme Court directs a judge of probate, in the settlement of the accounts of the curator of a succession, to allow to the latter a credit upon his account from the date of his eviction from property sold to him by the deceased, for an amount awarded to him as damages for such eviction, "and to close the account and give judgment according to law," but is silent as to interest, no interest will be allowed, the allowance of interest not being a necessary consequence of the credit at a particular date.

(2) Money Paid and Received through Mistake. — Where money has been paid and received by mutual mistake, the law will imply a contract to repay it as soon as the error is established and the person to whom it is due is ascertained, and interest is recoverable thereon as damages thereafter.¹ The converse of this rule is also true; that is, one to whom money is paid and who received it believing that it was his due is not chargeable with interest on such money until demand made and refusal to pay, nor until he has reason to be satisfied that he ought to repay it, and knows to whom payment should be made.²

Texas. — Floyd v. Efron, 66 Tex. 221.

Vermont. — Hodges v. Parker, 17 Vt. 242, 44 Am. Dec. 331.

A Partner Who Makes Advances for His Firm is, in some jurisdictions, entitled to interest only where there is a special contract to that effect, or where it may be implied from the circumstances that the firm was to pay interest for such advances. In other words, the claim of the partner is simply on account, the amount due on which cannot be ascertained until an accounting is had. Prentice v. Elliott, 72 Ga. 154; Sweeney v. Neely, 53 Mich. 421; Clark v. Warden, 10 Neb. 87; Holden v. Peace, 4 Ired. Eq. (39 N. Car.) 223. See also the title PARTNERSHIP.

Discharge of Liens. — Where the owner of premises pays judgments establishing mechanics' liens which are conclusive on the contractor and the sureties on a bond given by him to protect the owner against such liens, the former is entitled to interest on such payments. McFall v. Dempsey, 43 Mo. App. 369.

Principal and Surety. — Another familiar example of an implied contract to pay money upon the breach of which interest is recoverable exists in the case of payments made by a surety in discharge of the obligations of his principal. Petre v. Duncombe, 15 Jur. 86, 20 L. J. Q. B. 242; Miles v. Bacon, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 457; Thompson v. Stevens, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 493; Sims v. Goudelock, 7 Rich. L. (S. Car.) 23. See also Knight v. Mantz, 1 Ga. Dec. (pt. i.) 22. And see generally the title SURETYSHIP.

Contrary Doctrine. — It has been held, however, in England, that though the plaintiff has expended money at the request of the defendant, he cannot recover interest unless there is a contract to pay it. Carr v. Edwards, 3 Stark. 132, 14 E. C. L. 167. And see Hicks v. Mareco, 5 C. & P. 498, 24 E. C. L. 426; Tappenden v. Randall, 2 B. & P. 467. But compare, however, with the foregoing cases, Craven v. Tickell, 1 Ves. Jr. 60, decided in 1789, where it was decided that there may be a recovery of interest on money advanced to the use of another. In this case the amount advanced was for the purpose of building a house. There seems to have been no definite agreement as to the question of time for repayment, and yet interest was allowed. And compare also Trelawney v. Thomas, 1 H. Bl. 305.

(4) Money Fraudulently or Wrongfully Obtained. — Where a party has obtained money by fraud or imposition, the law implies a contract for its immediate payment or repayment to the person rightfully entitled thereto, and for a breach of this duty there may be a recovery of interest as damages for the detention of the money.¹

(5) Money Wrongfully or Unlawfully Withheld. — Where one has received the money of another and has not the right conscientiously to retain it, the law imposes interest as damages for the breach of an implied promise to pay it over;² and if one man retains the money of another, the presumption is that he kept it for the purpose of profit, and for this reason, therefore, he should pay interest on it.³

(6) Money Had and Received — (a) General Rule. — Interest is recoverable on money had and received to the use of another, after it has become the duty of the receiptor to pay it over to the person entitled or to apply it in a particular manner if not so paid over or applied.⁴

Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay. — In Montana interest is not recoverable in actions to recover money paid, laid out, and expended for another, unless it can be claimed on the ground of unreasonable and vexatious delay. Isaacs v. McAndrew, 1 Mont. 454.

Recovery Back of Usury. — Interest is recoverable in an action to recover back the amount of usury paid. Sharp v. Pike, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 155.

Interest on Excess of Freight. — Where a plaintiff had been required by a carrier to pay higher freight rates than were allowed by law, it was held proper that there should be a recovery back of interest on the excess paid, at least from the institution of the suit. *Graham v. Where Receipt of Money Fraudulently Concealed. — There may also be a recovery of interest on money received to the use of a party where its receipt is fraudulently concealed from the party entitled thereto.¹

(b) Contrary Doctrine. — Though the general rule as to money had and received is as stated, a different view has been taken in some cases.²

(7) Conversion of Money. — Where one wrongfully converts money of another to his own use, interest will be allowed from the time when the money should have been paid over.³

Misapplication of Funds. — Where money is received to be applied to a particular purpose, the law implies, in the absence of an express contract, an undertaking on the part of the person receiving it that it shall be so applied. If, therefore, there is default in this particular, interest will be recoverable on the money paid from the time of its receipt.⁴

d. INTEREST AS MEASURE OF DAMAGES. — For the breach of a contract to pay money, interest is not only recoverable, but is the very measure of damages.⁵

Money Received by Agent. — Where the defendants, as agents for the sale of certain property, received money thereon, which they failed to pay over promptly to their principal, it was held proper to award interest on the fund so received. Melvin v. Aldridge, 81 Md. 650.

By Statute in Indiana, under an early statute, interest was recoverable in an action for money had and received where the money is retained without the owner's knowledge, or where it is retained after it has been demanded; but not in other cases on a count for money had and received. Hawkins v. Johnson, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 21.

Money Received in Illegal Transaction. — It has been held that where money has been paid to brokers for the purchase of stocks on margin to be delivered on a future day, no interest is recoverable in an action to recover it back. Baldwin v. Zadig, 104 Cal. 594.

This Measure Is Not Varied, no matter what amount of inconvenience has been sustained by the plaintiff on account of the defendant's act,¹ nor is the rule changed though collateral and incidental damages have in fact resulted from the defendant's failure to pay.²

Contract to Lend Money. — Accordingly, it has been held that damages for breach of a contract to lend money cannot extend to losses incurred by the party desiring to borrow, by reason of the necessary sacrifice of his property which would have been avoided but for the breach of contract,³ nor, it has been decided, can damages beyond the amount to be forborne, with interest and costs, be recovered on the breach of a contract to forbear to collect a debt.⁴

2. Requisites to Recovery — a. IN GENERAL. — In order to recover interest by way of damages for the breach of a contract to pay money, express or implied, it is necessary that both the amount to be paid and the time for payment be reasonably certain or susceptible of ascertainment.⁵ With these essentials established, the default of the debtor will render the right of recovery of interest complete.⁶

b. AMOUNT TO BE PAID — (1) In General. — It is obviously necessary that the amount due should be certain, or at least susceptible of ascertain-

Rule Stated. — In the case of Loudon v. Taxing Dist., 104 U. S. 771, one of the questions involved was whether, because the city of Memphis neglected to pay the debts it owed to the appellant when they fell due, it must make good to him the losses sustained on that account through exactions of extraordinary interest and discounts on sales of securities to raise money to meet his own obligations. Waite, C. J., said: "It is sufficient to say that all damages for delay in the payment of money owing upon contract are provided for in the allowance of interest, which is in the nature of damages for withholding money that is due. The law assumes that interest is the measure of all such damages."

Costs of Collection of Debt. — In Quebec, in the case of an obligation for the payment of money, the damages resulting from the debtor's default are restricted by art. 1077, C. C., to interest on the sum, either at the rate stipulated, or, in the absence of an agreement, at the rate fixed by law; and the stipulation of a fixed sum, in addition to the interest, for costs of collection, is illegal. *Leduc v. Rule Stated. — Two things must necessarily pre-exist to raise a duty on the part of the debtor to pay the debt, namely, the ascertainment of the amount to be paid and its maturity. If these essentials are wanting, the debt, although existing, cannot be said to be due and withheld, and the duty to pay has not become imperative upon the debtor, and interest as damages for nonpayment cannot therefore be allowed. Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. St. 340.

ment,¹ because without this the debtor cannot be in default.²

(2) Rule as to Unliquidated Demands — (a) In General. — The doctrine that the defendant should not be made liable for interest as damages for breach of contract except in cases where the amount of his debt is reasonably certain finds expression most frequently in the statement that interest is not recoverable on unliquidated damages or demands.³

Unliquidated Demands for Services. — It has been held, accordingly, that an unliquidated demand for services will not bear interest,⁴ especially where the account was not rendered before suit, and where a greater sum was claimed than was allowed.⁵

Claim Subject to Contingent Deductions. — A written instrument admitting money to be due on settlement of accounts, but subject, in a certain event, to a deduction, draws interest, under the statute of Indiana, on the amount remaining due after the deduction has been made. Kellenberger v. Foresman, 13 Ind. 475. Compare Pengra v. Wheeler, 24 Oregon 532.

Amount to Be Ascertained by Appraisement. — An agreement provided that the defendant should pay for a party-wall, upon the amount being ascertained by appraisers to be appointed by the parties. It was held that until an appraisement or something done by the defendant to prevent it, the plaintiff could not sue on the agreement, and the amount being unliquidated, a demand would not entitle him to interest, though the defendant was using the wall. *Thorndike v. Where the Amount Due for Professional Services is not susceptible of ascertainment by computation or reference to market value, the plaintiff is not entitled to interest prior to verdict or judgment. Swinerton v. Argonaut Land, etc., Co., 112 Cal. 375.

5. Special Application of Rule. — Doyle v. St. James Church, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 178. And see Marsh v. Fraser, 37 Wis. 149.

But an Employee Wrongfully Discharged before the expiration of his contract of employment may recover interest on the amount of wages due to him according to contract from the date of his discharge to the expiration of the period,¹ provided the action is not brought before the expiration of the agreed term, for in the latter event the damages are necessarily unliquidated and incapable of ascertainment by calculation, as liable to deduction by the amount received in other employment.²

What Is Unliquidated Demand. — An unliquidated claim, with reference to the allowance of interest, is one which one of the parties to the contract cannot alone render certain.³

Whenever a Demand Is Fixed and Certain, either by the agreement of the parties or by the operation of law, it is liquidated and will bear interest.⁴

(b) Modification of Rule. — Although the general rule is usually met with as stated above, the tendency of modern cases is to modify it in its strictest application.⁵ Thus, some cases only deny the right of recovery in such cases of interest eo nomine,⁶ or permit it from demand⁷ or from the date of the institution of the action.⁸

(c) Where Amount Capable of Ascertainment. — It is generally sufficient to the recovery of interest at the present time that the amount, though not ascertained, is capable of ascertainment by mere computation.⁹

(d) Amount in Dispute. — A dispute as to the contract or some of the items thereof is not always conclusive of the fact that a demand is so unliquidated that no interest is recoverable.¹⁰

Not Necessary to Be in Writing. — In order for a demand to be liquidated so as to draw interest it is not necessary that it should be in writing. Anderson v. State, 2 Ga. 370; Nisbet v. Lawson, 1 Ga. 287. But in the earlier case of Fell v. Abbot, R. M. Charl. (Ga.) 452, which was decided under a statute that "no verdict shall be received on any unliquidated demand where the jury have increased their verdict on account of interest," it was held that all demands were unliquidated unless evidenced by a written acknowledgment or promise. A verbal acknowledgment, therefore, though it be of indebtedness in a certain sum, and a promise to pay such sum, is unliquidated.

Interest on Judgment for Unliquidated Damages. — It seems to have been intimated also that although no interest on a judgment for unliquidated damages might be included in an execution thereon, yet in a subsequent action on the judgment the rule might be different. Marshall v. Dudley, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 244. But compare Daub v. Martin, 2 Day (S. Car.) 193, in which case it was held that in an action founded on a judgment for tort, interest was not recoverable because the case originally sounded in damages.

Claim Part Liquidated and Part Unliquidated. — The fact that a claim for a definite sum is joined with claims for unliquidated amounts does not affect the claimant's right to recover interest on the liquidated portion of the demand. Coxe v. State, 144 N. Y. 396.

But Where a Party's Right to Compensation under a Contract Is Doubtful, and is contested on reasonable grounds, and suit is required in order to determine the amount due to him, interest will not be allowed for the time preceding such determination.¹

(3) Accounts — (a) Unliquidated Accounts. — Interest is not generally recoverable on an unliquidated mutual account current prior to an ascertainment of the balance due and some demand on the debtor for payment, or a contract, law, or custom by which interest becomes payable on balances of accounts at or after a certain time.²

(b) Liquidated Accounts. — With reference to the recovery of interest on accounts a different rule applies where the account has been liquidated and a balance struck and where the amount is unliquidated as stated above. The general Interest on Disputed Items from Institution of Action. — Where, upon the presentation of an account for professional services, the defendant admitted an indebtedness for the items therein contained, subject to modification and correction as to the amount of the charges, and upon subsequent trial the defendant disputed the amount charged in three items, it was held that the interest on the disputed items should have been limited to the date of the commencement of the action, but upon the undisputed items interest was recoverable from the date of the presentation of the bill. Hand v. Church, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 303.

In the somewhat similar case of Stimpson v. Green, 13 Allen (Mass.) 326, it appeared that the defendant had rendered an account of the profits in a joint enterprise, but some of the items were in dispute, and the balance was not liquidated, nor had any special demand been made upon him. It was held that interest on the balance found due should be allowed only from the commencement of the suit.

Rationale of Rule. — The real condition of such an account is, it has been said, that before liquidation, where the accounts are mutual or where they are not mutual, the credit is not terminated; the debt is not due until the liquidation takes place, but then it at once becomes the duty of the debtor to pay the balance or amount found due by him, and on default the law makes him pay damage for the breach of the contract to pay. Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 350, 72 Am. Dec. 102.

Agreement for Specific Term of Credit. — Ordinarily, in the absence of any evidence of usage or of a special agreement between the parties, interest cannot be recovered on an open running account for goods sold and delivered, when there was no specific term of credit agreed on between the parties. Fisher v. Sargent, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 250.

Wrongful Acquisition or Detention of Money. — Interest cannot be recovered on an open and running account for work, labor, goods sold, and the like, unless there is a contract to pay interest, or some usage, as in the case of the custom of merchants, from which a contract may be inferred, or where the defendant is a wrongdoer in acquiring or detaining money. Goff v. Rehoboth, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 475.

The Mere Act of Striking a Balance of the Account between the parties does not entitle the party in whose favor the balance is to interest from that time.² But where a debtor to whom a bill is presented admits that it is correct, the account is liquidated, within the meaning of a statute allowing interest on the settlement of accounts from the date of liquidation.³

(c) Interest by Agreement of Parties. — As a matter of course, however, by express agreement of the parties or by agreement implied from custom, interest may be recovered on the items of an account before liquidation, or on a balance found due as of any previous date.⁴ Thus, though the plaintiffs and the defendant kept a running account for many years, which was unsettled, and bore no interest, it was held that interest was payable on a note given by the plaintiffs to the defendant for money loaned in the course of their mutual dealings, which by its terms bore interest, though the note was included in the account.⁵

Set-off and Counterclaim. — Interest is allowed on the items of an independent account when used as a set-off or counterclaim to extinguish or reduce a debt, but is not to be computed upon payments as such the effect of which is to reduce pro tanto the sum due, interest being first discharged. Overby v. Fayetteville Bldg., etc. Assoc., 81 N. Car. 56.

c. TIME FOR PAYMENT. — In addition to certainty as to the amount, certainty as to the time when the debt is due is essential to the recovery of interest as damages for the breach of the contract to pay.¹

But No Time Need Be Expressly Fixed for the payment of the debt.² It will be sufficient if the time for payment be ascertainable by implication or from the nature of the transaction.³

d. NECESSITY FOR DEFAULT — (1) In General. — After the ascertainment of the amount to be paid and the time when it is payable, the default of the debtor completes the right to interest as damages,⁴ but of course there need be no default to authorize the recovery of interest where there is an express or implied contract to pay it.⁵

Contingency Which May Never Happen. — In an action on an agreement to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money in case the promisor should not be compelled to pay a certain judgment against him, less the expenses of litigation in endeavoring to defeat the judgment claim, it was held error to charge the defendant with interest on the entire fund from the date of the promise. Canada. — Daly v. Daly, 1 Quebec Super. Ct. 457.

Condition Precedent Not Performed. — Where money is deposited in a bank to be paid to the plaintiff on a check indorsed by two parties, and such parties refuse to indorse it, the plaintiff cannot recover interest as against the bank from the time of his demand, as the bank was not in default until the check was presented duly indorsed by the parties. Cooper v. Townsend, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 13 N. Y. Supp. 766, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 624.

Statutory Demand Against County. — In an action under a statute making a county liable for property destroyed by a mob, but making no provision for the payment of interest on the damages, the court held that interest was not recoverable. Weir v. Allegheny County, 95 Pa. St. 413.

Husband Using Wife's Funds. — Where a wife permits her husband to have the use of her money without any agreement or claim for the payment of interest upon it, she cannot recover interest from his estate except for the period that has elapsed after his death. Wormley's Estate, 137 Pa. St. 101.

Similarly it has been held a husband who has the administration of his paraphernal funds cannot be charged by the wife with interest thereon before a dissolution of the community between them. Burns v. Thompson, 39 La. Ann. 377.

Default in the Payment of an Interest Coupon will not give a right of recovery on interest coupons not due, although the note to which the coupons are attached provides that if any interest shall remain unpaid after due, the principal note and all interest coupons shall become due and payable at once, at the option of the holder. Cloud v. Rivord, 6 Wash. 555.

But in an Action to Enforce a Vendor's Lien for default in payment of an instalment in the purchase price of certain property, interest is recoverable on the deferred instalment of the purchase price not yet due, where by the terms of the contract of sale all instalments bear interest from date. Bowman v. Duling, 39 W. Va. 619.

Doctrine that Default Unnecessary. — It has been held in terms under a statute providing that all debts shall bear interest at a specified rate from the time when due, that "no default is necessary to enable the creditor to receive interest of five per cent. [the statutory rate] on a claim for money from the time it is payable." Collins v. Sabatier, 19 La. Ann. 299. But this case does not mean what it says, for an omission to pay a debt when due is, of course, a default.

5. Rogers v. Yarnell, 51 Ark. 198.

(2) Default in Liquidating Debt. — In addition to default by failure to pay a debt the amount and maturity of which have been ascertained, there may be such default on the part of the debtor in failing to liquidate the debt as will render him liable to interest on the amount subsequently ascertained, from the prior date at which the debt should have been liquidated.¹

(3) Liability of Mere Depositary. — It is held that one in whose hands money is placed as a mere depositary or stakeholder is not liable for interest thereon prior to demand and default.²

Where Depositary Makes Interest on Deposit. — In some instances the rule that no interest is recoverable against a mere depositary has been extended to include cases where the depositary actually makes interest on the fund in his hands.³ But in other cases it is intended that under such circumstances the true owner of the fund should be entitled to the interest as an increment of the principal.⁴

e. DEMAND — (1) General Rule. — Whenever a demand by a creditor is necessary to fix the time for the payment of the debt,⁵ interest does not Debtor's Duty to Liquidate Debt. — Where by contract it was the defendant's duty at a certain time to liquidate the debt, interest is recoverable on the balance found due from that time. McMahon v. New York, etc., R. Co., 20 N. Y. 463.

Agent's Failure to Notify Principal of Receipt of Money. — In Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 353, 10 Am. Dec. 340, the court said that "if the agent had received moneys and neglected for a long time to inform his principal of the fact, and willfully suffered him to remain in ignorance that the debtor had paid to the agent there would be equity in requiring the agent to pay interest, for here would be a case of default and breach of duty." And in Landman v. Crooks, 4 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 353, where it appeared that an agent had received large sums of money for his principal, and had used it for many years in his own business, instead of remitting it to his principal as he might and should have done, he was held chargeable with six per cent. interest and annual rests.

Where two contending claimants for money in the sheriff's hands agreed that the sheriff should deposit the amount in bank until the question should be decided, and the sheriff so deposited it, but took it out again soon after, it was held that the sheriff was bound to pay interest to the successful party from the time when the money was thus taken out of the bank. Com. v. Crevor, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 121.

Funds in Hands of Receiver. — While the widow's share of a fund decreed to her in lieu of dower is held by the court in the hands of its receiver, or is being brought in by the receiver, it bears no interest unless it makes interest. If, however, the receiver is personally derelict in not paying out money when he ought to do so, he is personally chargeable with interest for withholding it, but not otherwise. Johnson v. Moon, 82 Ga. 247. See generally the title RECEIVERS.

Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay. — In Corsen v. Neatheny, 9 Colo. 212, mere delay on the part of a stakeholder to pay over money was held not of itself to warrant the allowance of interest under a former statute allowing interest on "money withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay."

5. Time of Payment Fixed by Demand. — It is generally considered that a demand operates by way of fixing the time of payment, rather than by liquidating the amount due. Brewer v. Tyringham, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 547; Palmer v. Stockwell, 9 Gray (Mass.) 237; White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 394, 34 Am. Rep. 544; Rexford v. Comstock, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 3 N. Y. Supp. 878; Marsh v. Fraser, 37 Wis. 149; Tucker v. Grover, 60 Wis. 245; Hewitt v. John Week Lumber Co., 77 Wis. 548. See the title DEMAND, vol. 9, p. 197.

In Thorndike v. Wells Memorial Assoc., 146 Mass. 619, it was expressly declared that where a claim is uncertain and unliquidated, a mere demand is not sufficient to put the debtor in default, so as to render him liable for interest.

On the Other Hand it has been held that where the plaintiff had performed work for the defendant without any agreement as to the price, begin to run, in the absence of a contract therefor, until a demand has been made.¹ This is the case where the contract either expressly or impliedly provides for the payment of the principal debt on demand,² or where the claim is for money paid under mutual mistake,³ or for the conversion he should be allowed to take interest on a reasonable and proper amount from the time when payment was demanded. De Carricarti v. Blanco, 121 N. Y. 230; De Carricarte v. De Lastres, 121 N. Y. 662; Gray v. Van Amringe, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 128. And see Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 56; McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 316; Ledyard v. Bull, 119 N. Y. 12.

In Louisiana, Since the Act of March 20, 1839, it has been held that sums due on contracts bear interest from judicial demand though unliquidated. Barrow v. Reab, 9 How. (U. S.) 366. But see Henry v. Roe, 83 Tex. 446, construing the Texas statute.

The Reason of the Rule which holds that on a debt made payable in terms on demand, interest is not recoverable until a demand made, is obvious. Interest being in the nature of damages for nonpayment, it would be unreasonable to suffer the holder of a bill or note by his own laches to acquire a benefit, and to subject the drawer, acceptor, or indorser to damages when he was guilty of no default. See Cannon v. Beggs, 1 McCord L. (S. Car.) 370, 10 Am. Dec. 677.

Note or Duebill Payable on Demand.—A note or duebill payable on demand bears interest only from demand made, and not from the date, unless so expressed, although specified to be for a loan of money on the day of the date. Schmidt v. Limehouse, 2 Bailey L. (S. Car.) 276; Cannon v. Beggs, 1 McCord L. (S. Car.) 370, 10 Am. Dec. 677.

Notice by Corporation to Present Bonds for Payment.—Where a railroad company published a notice that certain bonds issued by it would be payable at a specified place and would be paid on presentation, no interest to accrue thereafter, it was held that interest would cease to run on a bond not presented as required. Emlen v. Lehigh Coal, etc., Co., 47 Pa. St. 76, 86 Am. Dec. 518. Nor, it has been held, is interest allowable on the notes of a banking company where the notes are payable on demand, and no demand for payment has been made before the winding up of the company is ordered. In re Herefordshire Banking Co., L. of property,¹ or in any case where the money of one person has come into the possession of another who is not chargeable with any fault or wrong in respect thereto.²

Money in Hands of Agents. — So, too, where money is received by a person as agent for another, and it is not his duty, as such agent, to pay the money over immediately or to make any particular disposition of it, interest does not begin to run until a demand has been made.³

(2) Exceptions to General Rule. — The requirement of the general rule stated above is necessarily dispensed with if, for any reason, a demand cannot be made, as where the debtor has absented himself,⁴ or if a demand would be a useless formality, as where the debtor has become a bankrupt or insolvent,⁵ or where there are no funds provided for the payment of the debt at the place where the demand should have been made.⁶

(3) Requisites of Demand — (a) In General. — It has been held that a demand such as will lay the foundation of a claim for interest must be a separate and distinct demand for a debt or sum of money which is afterwards proved or admitted to be due.⁷

Payment of Less than Due. — Where, through a mutual mistake of the parties, less than is really due is paid in a settlement of accounts, interest on the balance remaining unpaid is not recoverable until the error is discovered and a demand is made. Second, etc., St. Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 51 Pa. St. 465; Brainard v. Champlain Transp. Co., 29 Vt. 154.

1. Claim for Conversion. — Dougherty v. Chapman, 29 Mo. App. 233.

2. Possession of Another's Money Generally. — U. S. v. Curtis, 100 U. S. 119; U. S. v. Denver, 106 U. S. 536; Ingersoll v. Campbell, 46 Ala. 282; Talbot v. Commonwealth Nat. Bank, 129 Mass. 67, 37 Am. Rep. 302; Black v. Goodman, 1 Bailey L. (S. Car.) 201.

Public Officers. — Where an officer of the government has money committed to his charge with the duty of paying it out as occasion may arise, he cannot be charged with interest on such money until it is shown that he has failed to pay when such occasion required him to do so, or has failed to account when required by the government, or to pay over or transfer the money on some lawful order. U. S. v. Denver, 106 U. S. 536; U. S. v. Knowles, 106 U. S. 537, note.

Where, Pending Litigation as to the Ownership of Attached Property, the goods were sold and turned over to the purchaser, who received them on the understanding that he should not be called upon for the price until the issue as to ownership was decided, it was held that no liability arose for interest on the price before payment became due according to the agreement of the parties and a demand was made therefor. Evans v. Beckwith, 37 Vt. 285.

Unreasonable Delay After Demand. — Where money was left with a party for the purpose of purchasing corn, it was held that interest thereon would not be allowed in the absence of an unreasonable delay in refunding the money after a demand therefor. Myers v. Walker, 24 Ill. 133.

Vermont. — Hauxhurst v. Hovey, 26 Vt. 544.

But an Agent Who Receives and Fraudulently Converts to His Own Use the money of his principal which it is his duty to invest is liable for interest thereon from the time of the receipt without a previous demand for payment. Hill v. Hunt, 9 Gray (Mass.) 66.

Order by Principal for Money in Hands of Agent. — Where a principal indebted to a third party gave to the latter an order on his agent for a balance due to the former, it was held that as the sum named therein became due on the presentation of the order to the drawee, the payee was entitled to interest from that time. Brem v. Covington, 104 N. Car. 589.

4. Debtor Absent from State. — Graham v. Chrystal, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 263.

5. Insolvency of Debtor. — Chemical Nat. Bank v. Bailey, 12 Blatchf. (U. S.) 480; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27.

6. Want of Funds at Place of Demand. — Where commercial paper is made payable at a particular place, but no funds are there to meet it on maturity, interest continues to run though the holder made no demand for payment at the place named. Skinker v. Butler County, 112 Mo. 332. See also Culver v. Marks, 122 Ind. 544, 17 Am. St. Rep. 377, holding that presentation of a bank check is not necessary to set interest running where the drawer had no funds on deposit applicable to the payment of the check.

7. Requisites of Demand. — Goff v. Rehoboth, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 475; Cutter v. New York, 92 N. Y. 166; Blodgett v. Converse, 60 Vt. 410; Marsh v. Fraser, 37 Wis. 149; Tucker v. Grover, 60 Wis. 245. See also Oriental Bank v. Tremont Ins. Co., 4 Met. (Mass.) 1; Hubbard v. Charlestown Branch R. Co., 11 Met. (Mass.) 124. And see generally the title DEMAND, vol. 9, p. 197.

(b) Excessive Demand. — A demand for the payment of a sum which is larger than that really due will not, it has been held, operate to put the defendant in default in such a manner as to warrant a recovery of interest.¹ But though in an accounting more was demanded than was ultimately obtained, it was held that interest should, as a general rule, be allowed.²

(4) Evidence and Presumption of Demand. — An acknowledgment in writing signed by the debtor, that a demand has been made upon him, is sufficient to put him in default and to render the debt interest-bearing from the date of his acknowledgment.³

A Partial Payment on the Debt will, as a general rule, be considered as having been made pursuant to a demand so that the balance due and payable when the part payment was made will bear interest thereafter.⁴

(5) Institution of Suit as Demand — (a) In General. — Where a default upon demand will warrant the recovery of interest, the institution of a suit will, as a rule, constitute such a demand as will justify the assessment of interest thereafter.⁵

In the Case of a Mutual Account Current, it has been held that a meeting of the parties and an unsuccessful attempt to adjust a balance of the account might properly be regarded as a demand or claim of payment on both sides for what should happen to be due. Gleason v. Briggs, 28 Vt. 135.

Necessity for Production of Note. — In order that a demand for the payment of a note, payable on demand, may set interest running, it is not necessary that the note should be produced. Sanford v. Crocheron, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 8 Civ. Pro. (N. Y.) 146.

Requisites of Demand under 3 and 4 Wm. IV — Demand by Letter. — In Mowatt v. Londresborough, 4 El. & Bl. 1, 82 E. C. L. 1, 18 Jur. 1094, 23 L. J. Q. B. 38, 2 C. L. R. 1181, it appeared that before action the plaintiff, by letter to the defendant, demanded repayment of the whole of the deposits which he had paid on shares in a company which afterwards proved an abortive undertaking, adding that he should expect to be paid five per cent. interest from a time specified, which was prior to the date of the letter. This was held to constitute a sufficient demand of payment within the statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV., c. 42, § 28, to entitle the jury to give interest from the date of the demand until the time of payment. See also Geake v. Ross, 23 W. R. 658, 44 L. J. C. Pl. 315, 32 L. T. N. S. 666. Compare Ward v. Eyre, 15 Ch. D. 130, 49 L. J. Ch. D. 657, 43 L. T. N. S. 525, 28 W. R. 712.

Answer and Counterclaim. — In an action by the vendee in a contract for the sale of land for specific performance thereof, it has been held that the vendor's answer and counterclaim for past-due instalments of the purchase money would be sufficient to warrant the recovery of interest thereafter although it was specially provided in the contract that no interest was to be computed on deferred payments — they

(b) Suit Subsequently Dismissed. — It has been held that the institution of a suit, though afterwards dismissed, is such a demand, putting the defendant in default, as will entitle the plaintiff to recover, in a subsequent action, interest from the date of the institution of the first suit.¹

(6) When Demand Unnecessary. — From what has been said it is clear that a demand will never be necessary to the recovery of interest where the amount of the debt and the date when payment should be made are already ascertained.²

And Where It Is the Duty of a Party to Pay Over Money Within a Reasonable Time after its receipt, interest will be allowed after the expiration of such time, though no demand for payment is made.³

Where There Is a Contract for Interest, it may in general be computed in conformity therewith, irrespective of a demand for the payment of the principal.⁴

(7) Demands under Particular Statutes. — In some jurisdictions a demand is made necessary to the recovery of interest under prescribed conditions. The practitioner must, of course, consult his local statutes in the examination of questions connected with this subject.⁵

3. Contracts Other than to Pay Money — a. GENERAL RULE. — Where the action is for damages for the breach of a contract to do something other than to pay money, the rule against the recovery of interest on unliquidated damages has been held generally applicable.⁶

Computation. — Where the amount of the plaintiff's damages, in an action for the breach of a contract, though unliquidated, is ascertainable by computation merely, it is not infrequently held that interest thereon is recoverable.¹

(2) Market Values. — It has been held in many cases that interest is recoverable where the amount of the defendant's liability, though unliquidated and not in terms pecuniary, is ascertainable by computation with reference to established market values.²

The Reason Given for This Modification of the Earlier Rule that interest is not recoverable on unliquidated damages is that in many cases market values are "so well established and so easily obtained that it is easy for the debtor to obtain some proximate knowledge of how much he is to pay."³

Where No Market Value. — The exception to the rule in question does not apply where the property with reference to which the contract is made has no established market value⁴ or the evidence as to market values is uncertain and conflicting.⁵

(3) Contracts to Deliver Personalty. — In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to deliver personal property, interest has been held recoverable on the damages assessed.⁶

Where the Purchase Money or Consideration Has Been Paid, the interest recoverable is computed on the value of the property involved.¹

Where the Consideration Has Not Been Paid, interest is recoverable on the difference between the contract price and the market price on the day when delivery should have been made.²

(4) Warranties. — There would seem to be no reason, pursuant to the doctrines already considered, for denying the right of recovery of interest on the damages assessed for the breach of a warranty as to the quality of goods.³

(5) Contract to Execute Bill or Note. — In case of the breach of a contract to execute a bill of exchange or promissory note in payment of a debt, there may be a recovery of interest as damages from the time when the bill or note would have borne interest if executed according to the contract.⁴ Even in a state of the law where interest was not allowed in the absence of a contract express or implied to pay it, interest seems to have been recoverable for the breach of an undertaking to deliver a promissory note or a bill of exchange for the price of goods sold. The reason stated is that the mercantile instrument, if it had been given, would have borne interest, and the defendant should not be put in a better position by the breach of his contract than he would have occupied had he performed it.⁵

c. INTEREST AS DAMAGES IN LIEU OF MORE CERTAIN STANDARD. — In

See generally the title SALES.

In an action for the breach of a contract to furnish dredge boats, interest has been held recoverable on the amount of damages sustained from the date thereof, in the discretion of the jury. Watkins v. Junker, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 38 S. W. Rep. 1129. And where the defendant contracted to furnish cars for the shipment of cattle, interest was allowed on the amount found as damages. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 608.

Doctrine that Interest as Such Not Recoverable. — It has been declared that interest as such is not allowed on damages for breach of a contract to deliver cotton. Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626, where this holding was made pursuant to the alleged rule that interest as such is not allowed on damages for the breach of a contract to which interest is not a legal incident, but on such cases may be allowed only by way of multiplier or punishment for some fraud, delinquency, or injustice of the debtor, or for some injury done by him to the creditor.

Interest Not Recoverable Unless Contract Rescinded. — According to the doctrine of some cases, where a contract for the delivery of a chattel is broken in a failure to deliver, and the purchaser has paid the price in advance, he may elect to rescind the contract and recover interest on the money paid. But if he elects to affirm the contract and sue for damages, he cannot recover interest. Dobenspeck v. Armel, 11 Ind. 31; Harvey v. Myer, 9 Ind. 391.

Measure of Damages Wholly Uncertain. — Where the measure of damages depends upon such uncertain quantities as the difference between the value of a crop raised from cabbage seed sold and that which would have been produced had the seed been as represented, it has been held that interest was not recoverable. White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 394, 34 Am. Rep. 544. A later case, however, purporting to follow White v. Miller, seems to have laid down the rule as a general proposition that interest should not be allowed as damages for a breach of warranty in the sale of goods. Riss v. Messmore, 58 N. Y. Super. Volume XVI.

some instances, where, from the nature of the case, the actual damages sustained were extremely uncertain, interest has been adopted as the measure of damages in lieu of a more definite standard of calculation.¹

VI. INTEREST AS DAMAGES FOR TORT — 1. In General. — As the damages recoverable in actions for torts are necessarily unliquidated and often wholly uncertain, the early rule was that interest on such damages was not recoverable.²

2. Torts to Property — a. IN GENERAL. — The common-law objection to the recovery of interest in cases of tort for unliquidated damages seems to have been first modified in actions of trover and conversion, where the value of the property was sought, as having been converted into money.³

b. INJURIES TO OR DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY. — At the present time the rule of most jurisdictions is that in cases of trover or trespass or in actions for injuries to or destruction or loss of property, negligent or otherwise, interest is recoverable on the damages assessed.⁴

1. Interest on Capital Invested. — In Green v. Williams, 45 Ill. 208, it was held that while speculative profits were not recoverable, a recovery was permitted under the circumstances of the case to the extent of interest on the amount of capital invested in the plaintiff's business, during the necessary suspension of such business caused by the defendant's breach of a contract of lease. See also Paola Gas Co. v. Paola Glass Co., 56 Kan. 614, 54 Am. St. Rep. 598.

But a plaintiff is not entitled to recover interest on the value of his entire stock of goods during the time when he is prevented from exposing them for sale by the defendant's breach of contract of lease. Lowenstein v. Chappell, 30 Barb. (N. Y.) 241.

Causing Mill to Remain Idle. — Where by reason of a vendor's delay to deliver logs according to contract the vendee's mill was necessarily idle, it was decided that interest on the value of the mill plant for the time during which it thus remained idle would not, under the circumstances, be objectionable as a measure of redress. Watson v. Kirby, 112 Ala. 436. See also Grosvenor v. Ellis, 44 Mich. 452.

In an Action of Tort for Unlawfully Obstructing a Stream, whereby the plaintiffs were unable to drive logs past the obstruction pursuant to a contract which they had undertaken, the final payment on the contract being thereby delayed for nearly a year, it was held that interest on the amount for the period of delay might be allowed to the plaintiff as damages. McPheters v. Moose River Log Driving Co., 78 Me. 334.

2. Interest on Damages for Torts — Common-law Rule. — Brentner v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 530.

3. Modification of Common-law Rule. — Paine v. Pritchard, 2 C. & P. 558, 12 E. C. L. 261; Brentner v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 530.

In Some Jurisdictions a Distinction Prevails as to the allowance of interest in actions of trover, replevin, and trespass, and where property has been negligently injured or destroyed, interest being allowed in the former case but not in the latter. See Omaha, etc., Smelting, etc., Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185; Watson v. Harmon, 85 Mo. 443. And see Walker v. Borland, 21 Mo. 289; State v. Smith, 31 Mo. 566; Spencer v. Vance, 57 Mo. 427. But, as it has been well said, it is difficult to perceive any sound distinction between the case where the defendant converted or carried away the plaintiff's horse and the case where through negligence on his part the horse is injured so as to be valueless. There is no reason apparent for a different rule of damages in the one case from that applied in the other. Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817. See also *Parrott v. Interest on Diminished Value. — Where the value of property is diminished by an injury wrongfully inflicted, the jury may, in its discretion, give interest on the amount by which the value is diminished from the time of the injury. Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817. Thus in an action to recover damages for the diminished enjoyment and value of improved property by the defendant's having obstructed the access thereto, if the evidence shows that the plaintiff was actually endeavoring to sell his property, and at that time there was a certain market price for it with the obstruction removed, but with it remaining only a certain lower price, the jury may find that the plaintiff had been deprived by this nuisance from receiving the difference between these two prices, and may render a verdict for such amount, with legal interest from the time when the plaintiff had been so deprived, subject to the statute of limitations. Hetzel v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 6 Mackey adequate compensation the law allows it as approximating compensation, and with a view of fixing some certain and uniform measure of recovery.¹

When Interest Is Given upon Such Theory, it is, in general, awarded as of the time when the injury was sustained and the loss suffered.²

c. DEPRIVATION OF USE. — Where one party is deprived of the use of property for a time by the wrong of another, the former will be entitled to interest on the value of the use of the property during such period.³

d. INTEREST EO NOMINE. — It has been held that interest eo nomine is not recoverable in actions ex delicto for damages to property;⁴ and according

(D. C.) 1; Moore v. Langdon, 6 Mackey (D. C.) 6.

Interest on Expenses of Restoration. — In an action for damages for injury to real property, interest is recoverable on the amount of the necessary expenditures in restoring the property. Sabine, etc., R. Co. v. Joachimi, 58 Tex. 456. Likewise interest on the cost of proper repairs upon a vessel injured by the defendant's negligence is a proper element of damages in an action therefor. Whitehall Transp. Co. v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 51 N. Y. 369; Mailler v. Express Propeller Line, 61 N. Y. 316. And see Worrall v. Munn, 38 N. Y. 151. But compare Sayre v. State, 123 N. Y. 291.

Statutory Cause of Action. — Interest is not recoverable where the action is brought under a statute prescribing and limiting the measure of damages and making no provision for interest. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Gabbert, 34 Kan. 132; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Muldrow, 54 Tex. 233. And see supra, this title, Origin and History of Interest — Actions under Special Statutes Making No Provision for Interest.

As to When Such Interest Is Recoverable as of Right and when in the discretion of the jury only, see infra, this title, Discretionary Interest and Interest as Matter of Right.

Interest Is Allowable in Michigan as damages for fraudulently misrepresenting the value of land sold or traded to the plaintiff, where the mere difference in the values of the property exchanged will not make good his damages.

Snow v. Nowlin, 43 Mich. 383; Cook v. Perry, 43 Mich. 623.

3. Deprivation of Use. — Johnson v. Bailey, 17 Colo. 59; Brown v. South-Western R. Co., 36 Ga. 377; Murrell v. Dixey, 14 La. Ann. 296; Hegar v. De Groat, 3 N. Dak. 354; Sabine, etc., R. Co. v. Joachimi, 58 Tex. 456.

Where a Plaintiff Is Wrongfully Deprived of the Use of Personal Property, he may recover interest on the value of such use during the time of his deprivation. Brown v. South-Western R. Co., 36 Ga. 377.

In Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 446, 5 Am. Dec. 348, which was an action of trespass against a sheriff for illegally taking the plaintiff's personal property, interest was allowed by way of damages.

Damages for Breach of Official Duty. — Where, by reason of the breach of an absolute and certain duty by a public official, the plaintiff has been unable to obtain an amount of money due to him, interest is recoverable in an action against such official. Clark v. Miller, 54 N. Y. 528. And see Clark v. Sheldon, 134 N. Y. 333. And in an action against a constable for the sale of the plaintiff's goods under an illegal execution, where the goods were bought in at the sale for the plaintiff, interest is recoverable on the amount so paid out from the date thereof. McInroy v. Dyer, 47 Pa. St. 118.

4. Interest Not Recoverable Eo Nomine — Georgia. — Western, etc., R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818; Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Palmer, 89 Ga. 161; Western, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13; Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 104 Ga. 611.

Missouri. — Dozier v. Jerman, 30 Mo. 216. Ohio. — Hogg v. Zanesville Canal, etc., Co., 5 Ohio 410.

Pennsylvania. — Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. St. 560; Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. St. 24, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867; Reading, etc., Co. v. Balthaser, 126 Pa. St. 1; Emerson v. Schoonmaker, 135 Pa. St. 437; Klages v. Philadelphia, etc., Terminal Co., 160 Pa. St. 386.

Utah. — Rhemke v. Clinton, 2 Utah 230. Where Damages Insusceptible of Definite Computation. — In actions of tort where the damages are not in their nature capable of exact computation as to both time and amount, no interest is recoverable eo nomine, the default of the defendant not being of a sufficiently absolute nature. Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37.

Interest on the Value of Chattels Converted is recoverable, not as interest strictly, but as damages for the retention of money equal to the legal interest on the value of the chattels converted. Omaha, etc., Smelting, etc., Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185.

to this rule it has been adjudged error to instruct the jury that they may allow interest eo nomine on the amount of the damages found from the date of the injury.¹

Consideration of Lapse of Time Since Injury. — But although interest as such is not recoverable, the lapse of time between the happening of the injury and the time of trial is ordinarily a proper subject for the consideration of the jury in making up the amount of damages for which the verdict should be rendered.²

e. UNREASONABLE AND VEXATIOUS DELAY. — Another line of cases declare that while interest is not ordinarily recoverable in actions for torts to property, yet where there has been an actual conversion of property into money there may be a recovery of interest in an action for damages, as for money unreasonably and vexatiously withheld.³

f. PROPERTY HAVING ASCERTAINABLE PECUNIARY VALUE. — In some of the decisions announcing the rule that interest on the value of property lost, injured, or destroyed, the doctrine is expressly or by implication limited to cases where the property involved is susceptible of a pecuniary valuation or has a fixed market price.⁴

And see Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 170; Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514; Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 62.

Damages for Simple Negligence. — In the case of Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Ayers, 56 Kan. 176, it was said that a recovery of damages for the simple negligence of a party to whom no benefit could accrue by reason of the injury inflicted should not include interest as such.

1. Erroneous Instruction of Jury. — Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 104 Ga. 611; Reading, etc., R. Co. v. Balthaser, 126 Pa. St. 1; Emerson v. Schoonmaker, 135 Pa. St. 437. Compare Bare v. Hoffman, 79 Pa. St. 71, 21 Am. Rep. 42.

2. Consideration of Lapse of Time. — Western, etc., R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818; Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Palmer, 89 Ga. 161; Gress Lumber Co. v. Coody, 104 Ga. 611; Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. St. 560; Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. St. 24, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867; Reading, etc., R. Co. v. Balthaser, 126 Pa. On Damages in Condemnation Proceedings, interest as such is not allowed, but it is proper for the jury to consider the lapse of time between the taking of the land and the time of trial in making up the amount of damages for which to render a verdict. Klages v. Philadelphia, etc., Terminal Co., 160 Pa. St. 386.

3. Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay. — Omaha, etc., Smelting, etc., Co. v. Tabor, 13 Colo. 41, 16 Am. St. Rep. 185; Machette v. Wanless, 2 Colo. 170; Hanauer v. Bartels, 2 Colo. 514; Tucker v. Parks, 7 Colo. 62; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cobb, 72 Ill. 153; Bradley v. Geiselman, 22 Ill. 494; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Ames, 40 Ill. 249; Northern Transp. Co. v. Selleck, 52 Ill. 249.

In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Shultz, 55 Ill. 421, which was an action for damages for injury to a colt, it was held proper to allow interest from the time when the injury was done. In the later case of Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 74 Ill. 83, it was held that what was said about interest in the former case was dictum merely, and erroneous. But in the still later case of Chicago v. Allcock, 86 Ill. 384, the doctrine of the Shultz case with reference to the allowance of interest on the damages assessed in an action of trespass to personal property was commented upon without adverse criticism and apparently recognized.

The Mere Withholding of Money, without bad faith or evil design, cannot, it has been held, be regarded as a tort, so as to warrant a recovery of interest as damages. Hoblit v. Bloomington, 71 Ill. App. 204.

4. Property Having Ascertainable Value — United States. — Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 161.

Connecticut. — Regan v. New York, etc., R. Co., 60 Conn. 124, 25 Am. St. Rep. 306.

Iowa. — Arthur v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 61 Iowa 648.

New York. — Greer v. New York, 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 406.

Pennsylvania. — Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37.

Tennessee. — See Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 41.

See also supra, this title, Interest as Damages for Breach of Contract — Contracts Other than to Pay Money — Market Values.

Thus, it has been held that indefinite damages resulting from the infringement of a patent cannot bear interest until the amount has been judicially ascertained. Tilghman v. Proctor, 125 U. S. 161. And see Crosby Steam Gage, etc., Co. v. Consolidated Safety Valve Co., 141 U. S. 441. It has been held, however, that although damages in such cases do not carry interest as such, interest may be allowed as a part of the damages, which is only a mode of stating the amount found. Bates v. St. Johnsbury, etc., R. Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 628; Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 205.

If Damages Are Discretionary with the Jury, or are not susceptible of any reasonably certain computation in money, interest is not allowable. Western, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397. See also infra, this section, Exemplary Damages and Torts to Person. See, however, Vietti v. Nesbitt, 22 Nev. 390, in which case it was said that although interest is frequently allowed in actions involving torts to property,

g. DOCTRINE THAT INTEREST NOT RECOVERABLE. — In some jurisdictions the rule is that interest is not recoverable as part of the damages in actions for torts to property. Most of the decisions so holding, however, depend upon special statutes regarded as exclusively controlling the subject of interest, and in which either no provision is made for interest in cases of unliquidated damages for tort, or its recovery in such cases is by implication denied.¹

h. INTEREST IN NEGLIGENCE CASES. — In some jurisdictions the rule seems to be that damages in the form of interest on the value of property negligently destroyed are not recoverable where no benefit could have accrued to the defendant by such destruction.² And on the same ground it has been held that interest is not allowable in an action against a sheriff for refusal to execute a writ of restitution in an ejectment suit.³

i. EXEMPLARY DAMAGES. — In a case of tort when the law allows the recovery of exemplary damages, the allowance and amount of which are entirely in the discretion of the jury, it is error to charge that interest may be computed on the sum so awarded.⁴

it is simply by way of damages and in actions where the amount of damages is more or less in the discretion of the jury.

Trespass Quare Clausum. — The case of Glidden v. Street, 68 Ala. 600, was an action of trespass quare clausum in which it was held that interest was not recoverable on the damages sustained until ascertained by verdict and merged in the judgment. This case professed to follow, on the question of interest, Jean v. Sandiford, 39 Ala. 317; but it should be observed that the latter case was an action under a special statute which made no provision for interest. See also Borden v. Bradshaw, 68 Ala. 362. 3. Torts to Person. — The general rule is, in the absence of statute, that interest is not recoverable on the damages awarded in actions for torts to the person,¹ because the damages in such cases are in a large measure discretionary with the jury and are not ascertainable with reference to a pecuniary standard of value.²

Consideration of Time Elapsed Since Injury. — But even in personal-injury cases, though the jury may not give interest eo nomine, it has been declared that they are at liberty to consider the lapse of time since the injury and make just allowance in the verdict therefor.³

VII. INTEREST AS MERE INCIDENT OF PRINCIPAL OR INTEGRAL PART OF DEBT

— 1. General Observations. — Judged merely by the language employed, many if not most of the cases tend to regard interest as, without qualification, a mere incident of the principal debt;⁴ but strictly speaking, it is only where trespass for cutting timber trees on the land of another, and allowing double or treble the value of the trees, authorize the jury to award interest in addition to the penalty. McCloskey v. Powell, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 22.

Utah. — Nichols v. Union Pac. R. Co., 7 Utah 510.

The Statutes in some jurisdictions allow interest, in the discretion of the jury, on damages for personal injuries. Ell v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 1 N. Dak. 336 26 Am. St. Rep. 621. It should be observed, however, that the North Dakota statute does not expressly give to juries the right to award interest on the damages in personal-injury cases. The statute in question only gives the right to award interest for the breach of obligations not arising from contract, and in cases of oppression, fraud, and malice.

Death by Wrongful Act. — In New York it is provided by statute (Laws 1870, c. 73; Code Civ. Pro., § 1904) that interest on the damages assessed in an action under the statute providing for a recovery for death by wrongful act must be given from the date of the death. Erwin v. Neversink Steamboat Co., 23 Hun (N. Y.) 578; Salter v. Utica, etc., R. Co., 86 N. Y. 401; Manning v. Port Henry Iron Ore Co., 91 N. Y. 664.

This statute was held constitutional in Cornwall v. Mills, 44 N. Y. Super. Ct. 45.

In Georgia, it has been held that in a civil action for personal injuries producing death, the jury may in its discretion award interest on the damages assessed, though there is no statutory authority therefor. Georgia R., etc., Co. v. Garr, 57 Ga. 280, 24 Am. Rep. 402; Central R. Co. v. Sears, 66 Ga. 409. And see Western, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 414.

See generally the title DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT, vol. 8, p. 955.

Judgments in Actions for Torts to Person. — In some jurisdictions the rule, by statute or otherwise, is that no interest is recoverable even where the damages for personal injuries have been put in judgment. Washington, etc., R. Co. v. Harmon, 147 U. S. 571; McMurtry v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co., 84 Ky. 462; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Sharpe, 91 Ky. 411.

Interest on Verdict from Day Arbitrarily Fixed by Jury. — A jury has no right, it has been said, in returning its verdict in an action for damages for a tort to the person, to select an antecedent day at its discretion and determine that interest on the amount of the verdict shall run from that day. Costello v. District of Columbia, 21 D. C. 508.

2. Reason of Rule. — Western, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397; Pittsburgh Southern R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. St. 306, 49 Am. Rep. 580.

No Interest Before Judicial Ascertainment. — The rule allowing interest on the value of property injured or destroyed does not apply to the case of personal injury which does not necessarily cease when inflicted and is not susceptible of definite and accurate computation. Such an injury does not create a debt, nor does it become one until it is judicially ascertained and determined. Only from that time, therefore, can it draw interest, and interest as damages cannot at any preceding time be added to it without changing and superadding a new element, warranted neither by principle nor authority. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35.

3. Consideration of Lapse of Time. — Smith v. East Nauch Chunk, 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 495; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35.

4. Interest Regarded as Mere Incident of Debt. — McConnel v. Thomas, 3 Ill. 313; Anderson's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 95; Howe v. Bradley, 19 Me. 31; Greenwood v. Fenton, 54 Neb. 573; Price v. Holman, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 2 N. Y. Supp. 184; Heath v. Page, 63 Pa. St. 108, 3 Am. Rep. 533.

In Howe v. Bradley, 19 Me. 36, while the court conceded the rule that where there is an express contract for interest it may be recovered after the payment of the principal, and where there is no express contract the reverse is the rule, it was held, notwithstanding, that "interest is an incidental amount arising out of and constantly accumulating from the principal."

interest is recoverable, if at all, as damages for the breach of a contract to pay money, or as part of the compensation in tort, that it can be said to be a mere incident of the principal sum with reference to which it is computed.¹ Where there has been an express contract to pay interest, the sum due therefor is as much an integral part of the debt as is the amount for the use of which the interest is contracted.²

2. Effect of Payment of Principal — a. INTEREST DUE BY CONTRACT. — As interest due by contract and accruing before the maturity of the principal becomes an integral part of the debt, or itself an independent liability, the payment of the principal will not ipso facto operate to defeat a subsequent demand for interest.³ There would be no more reason for holding that the payment of the original principal extinguished the claim for interest than that a part payment of such principal destroyed the right to the remainder.⁴

b. INTEREST RECOVERABLE AS DAMAGES — (1) In General. — Where

1. Correct Statement of Rule. — Price v. Holman, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 2 N. Y. Supp. 184; Southern Cent. R. Co. v. Moravia, 61 Barb. (N. Y.) 180; Bronner Brick Co. v. M. M. Canda Co., (Supm. Ct. Tr. T.) 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 681.

When Interest Ceases to Be Incident. — Interest follows the principal as an incident to it only so long as it remains an incident. Where it is separated and set apart from the principal by actual payment, or being carried, when due, to the credit of the owner of the principal, in his account with the debtor, and this in pursuance of a provision in the contract creating and defining the principal debt, it ceases to be an incident thereto and does not necessarily follow it. Ohio v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 6 Ohio St. 489.

An Assignment of a Named Amount "and Interest," being a portion of a judgment, as collateral security for a debt evidenced by a promissory note entitles the assignee not merely to the sum stated out of the judgment when collected, but is a present transfer of the interest then due on the judgment and as much of the principal of the judgment in addition as is necessary to make up the stipulated amount. And, it has been held, that part of the principal so arrived at will bear interest in favor of the assignee, but the interest on the judgment so included will not. Godbold v. Kirkpatrick, 26 S. Car. 607, 1 S. E. Rep. 156.

Separate Suits for Interest and Principal. — The principal sum secured by deed and the interest to be paid thereon are two different sums and not one entire sum, and either may be sued for independently of the other. Dickenson v. Harrison, 4 Price 282. Thus where the parties to a promissory note stipulate for interest to be paid before the maturity of the principal sum, a suit will lie for the recovery of the interest when it becomes due. Callin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 45.

Splitting Cause of Action. — It has been held, however, that where interest is properly recoverable as damages or otherwise, a plaintiff should seek to recover it in the action for the principal debt, and should not be permitted to split his cause of action and proceed for the principal in one suit and the interest in another. Hoblit v. Bloomington, 71 Ill. App. 204.

Mistake in Recovery — Less Interest than Due — Subsequent Suit — Held Not Maintainable. — Darlow v. Cooper, 34 Beav. 281. See also infra, this title, Annual and Periodic Interest.

4. Reason of Rule. — Milliken v. Southgate, 26 Me. 424; Fake v. Addy, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 76; Smith v. Buffalo, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 39 N. Y. Supp. 881.

Collateral Contract for Interest. — The defendant agreed with the plaintiff that if the latter would purchase a certain judgment against the former, he would pay to the plaintiff ten per cent. interest thereon as well as on another judgment which the plaintiff held, instead of seven per cent., the rate of interest which each judgment bore. About five years thereafter the defendant paid both judgments, with interest, however, at only seven per cent. It was held that an action lay for the additional interest. Greenwood v. Fenton, 54 Neb. 573. See also Florence v. Jenings, 3 Jur. N. S. 772, sub nom. Florence v. Drayson, 1 C. B. N. S. 584, 87 E. C. L. 584, 26 L. J. C. Pl. 274; McKay v. Fee, 20 U. C. Q. B. 268.

interest, if allowed at all, is recoverable only as damages for the breach of a contract to pay money, the general rule is that a payment of the principal will extinguish any further right to interest.¹

Independent Collateral Liability. — Where, however, there is an independent collateral liability for interest as damages, this may be enforced although the plaintiff has received the principal sum out of the deprivation of which the right to the recovery of interest has arisen. Thus, where the purchaser at an auction of a reversionary interest in bank stock, upon failure of the vendor to make a title, had recovered back the deposit in an action against the auctioneer, it was held that the vendee might nevertheless recover interest on the deposit in an action against the vendor for not completing his contract, under an averment of special damage in the plaintiff's losing, by reason of the nonperformance, the interest and benefit of his money.²

(2) Payment Pending Suit. — The effect of the acceptance of the principal as extinguishing a further claim to interest as damages has been held the same as above indicated, though such payment is made pending suit.³

(3) Claiming Right to Interest. — It is held that though the creditor, when he receives the principal, claims a right to interest and expresses a determination to assert it, such circumstance will not take the case out of the operation of the rule.⁴

Rule as Affected by Special Statute. — It has been held that a statute providing for interest and limiting the rate of interest on all contracts for the payment of money does not affect the rule that the acceptance of the principal is a bar to a subsequent action for interest which is recoverable only as damages. Graveson v. Odd Fellows' Temple Co., 6 Ohio Dec. 287.

Effect of Assignment of Principal. — It has been intimated that an assignment or transfer of the principal will operate as an assignment of the interest and will preclude the assignor from a subsequent action for the recovery thereof although such transfer may not have been designed to carry with it the interest which had accrued at the time. Kiddall v. Trimble, 1 Md. Ch. 150.

This Doctrine Has Been Likened by Analogy to the rule that in the absence of duress or compulsion, a party yielding to the demands of an adverse claim cannot detract from the force of his concession by accompanying it with an objection or protest when he actually pays the

(4) Agreement for Survival of Right. — The receipt of the principal will not in general bar a subsequent action for interest if it is agreed between the parties that it shall not have this effect.¹

(5) Rule of Application of Payments. — A payment by a debtor to a creditor claiming principal and interest of an amount equal to or greater than the principal debt will not necessarily extinguish the right of the latter to interest, as, if made generally, it may be first applied to the interest, leaving whatever balance there is due as principal.²

c. RULE UNDER SPECIAL STATUTES. — It has been held that where interest is specially provided for by statute in a particular case, the interest becomes thereby engrafted upon and a part of the debt itself. A payment and acceptance of the principal, therefore, will not under such circumstances alone defeat the right to interest.³

d. PAYMENTS IN COMPROMISE OR SETTLEMENT OF DEBT. — As a matter of course, where the principal of a debt, doubtful or contested, is paid in compromise of all liability, or where under other circumstances the parties have come to a valid accord, such payment or a satisfaction as agreed, to the extent of the principal sum, will operate to extinguish all further claim for interest, whether due by the antecedent contract or recoverable if at all as damages for its breach.⁴ This, however, is on an entirely different principle from those which have been discussed, but the cases have not always made the distinction clear.⁵

3. Effect of Payment of Interest. — There is certainly no ground for holding that the acceptance of interest is a bar to a right of recovery of the principal.⁶

But the Receipt of Interest in Advance may be evidence of a contract to delay the payment of the principal during the period for which the interest has been paid.⁷

claim. The payment nullifies the effect of the protest. Forrest v. New York, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 13 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 350; Fleetwood v. New York, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 481.

Agreement to Arbitrate Claim for Interest. — In Moore v. Fuller, 2 Jones L. (47 N. Car.) 205, the defendant paid the principal of his bond to the plaintiff, but refused to pay any interest. The plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to interest, and the matter, by agreement of the parties, was referred to arbitration. The arbitrators found for the plaintiff, but the defendant refused to abide by the award, and an action was brought on the bond. It was held that the bond was discharged by the payment of the principal, and that the plaintiff could not recover interest, which is but an incident to the principal.

VIII. COMPUTATION OF INTEREST — 1. General Rule. — The rule for the computation of interest is rather one of arithmetic than of law, except in so far as the avoidance of compound interest is concerned.¹

2. Partial Payments — a. WHERE COMPOUND INTEREST NOT ALLOWED. — The general rule in the case of partial payments where interest on interest is not allowed is to compute interest on the principal debt to the date of the first payment, where this equals or exceeds the interest due; then deduct the payment from the aggregate of principal and interest, and repeat the process as to successive payments. Where the payment does not equal or exceed the amount of interest due at the time when it is made, interest on the first principal should be computed until such time as the aggregate partial payments made equal or exceed the amount of interest due when the payment was made which, with prior payments, equals or exceeds the accrued interest, and such aggregate should then be deducted from the sum of the original principal and accrued interest, the balance constituting a new principal, so to remain until reduced as stated.²

See contra, Morse v. Blanchard, 117 Mich. 37. The Contract of Forbearance to Sue implied by law from the payment and acceptance of interest in advance is not overcome by the fact that it had been the custom of the debtor to pay interest from month to month, payment being made sometimes in advance and sometimes after the expiration of the month. British Columbia Bank v. Jeffs, 18 Wash. 135.

Day of Discount. — In the computation of interest on a discounted note the day on which a note is discounted is to be excluded; but a day's interest has accrued at any time of the next day, without regarding the fractions of that day. Burlington Bank v. Durkee, 1 Vt. 403.

In Computing Interest with Annual Rests, in the absence of any evidence of a different understanding between the parties, the first rest is to be made at the end of one year, computing from the commencement of the account, and so on from year to year. Carpenter v. Welch, 40 Vt. 251.

Where a Creditor Intrusted His Debtor with the Sale of Property to pay the debt, it was held that the account between the parties was properly stated by crediting the former with the original debt and each item of expense incurred, adding to each item interest from its date to the date of settlement, and charging him with each item received as consideration for the sale of the property or as rent, adding to the debits respectively interest to the date of settlement. Bell's Appeal, (Pa. 1887) 8 Aul. Rep. 927.

Where It Is a Custom among Bankers, for the sake of convenience, to compute interest at thirty days to the month and twelve months in the year, it is not error, in a case involving transactions with a banker, in the absence of any evidence to show that another mode of computation was specifically agreed upon by the parties, for the judge to assume that the usual mode of bankers was to be pursued and to direct the jury to compute interest accordingly. *Pool v. In the Absence of a Contrary Agreement Between the Parties, express or arising from implication, on a reference ordered to ascertain the amount of a debt, by stating an account between the parties, interest will be calculated on the various items of the account on the principle of partial payments.¹

b. WHERE INTEREST COMPOUNDED. — Where compound interest is not forbidden, interest may, if the parties so agree, be calculated on the new principal after the deduction of the credit, though such new principal consists in part of interest accrued before the partial payment was made.²

c. INTEREST ON PAYMENTS. — It is generally held that it is not proper, where there have been partial payments on an indebtedness, to compute interest on the principal debt until maturity or any given time, and the interest on payments made from the time when made until such time, and deduct the one sum from the other,³ though there have been decisions to the contrary.⁴ Such a mode of computation would, conceivably, permit the debtor not only to discharge himself without paying any principal, or even the interest contracted for, but eventually the original creditor would become the debtor, in an ever increasing amount.⁵

Abatement of Purchase Money. — In making an abatement of the purchase money of a tract of land, where the several notes given fall due at different times and do not bear interest until after maturity, it is a proper method of computing interest to divide the amount of the damages by the number of notes and to allow interest on each sum from the time when the notes respectively fell due; but where the several notes, though falling due at different times, all bear interest from a given day before maturity, the interest on the damages should be computed from that day, and not from the maturity of the last note. Wright v. Wright, 37 Ala. 420; Stow v. Bozeman, 29 Ala. 397.

1. Interest on a Reference. — Clift v. Moses, 75 Hun (N. Y.) 517.

2. Partial Payments Where Compound Interest Is Allowed. — Where the interest on a note is payable semiannually, the accruing interest should be added to the principal at the end of each half-yearly interval, and partial payments made will be deducted from the principal and interest as of the date when the payment is made. The computation of interest upon the new principal then continues, according to the terms of the contract, without regard to whether the payment made exceeds, equals, or falls short of the accrued interest. Farwell v. Sturdivant, 37 Me. 308; Bratton v. Allison, 70 N. Car. 498.

Upon a Note with Interest Annually, the computation at the end of the year should not be with rests on account of intermediate payments. If such intermediate payments were on account of the interest accruing but not yet due, they should be deducted at the end of the year, but without interest upon them. Townsend v. Riley, 46 N. "Connecticut Rule." — In Wallace v. Glaser, 82 Mich. 190, 21 Am. St. Rep. 556, where there was a controversy over the proper method of computing interest, the court said: "The commissioner to whom the case was referred computed the interest under what is known as the Connecticut rule; that is, he reckoned interest upon the principal up to the liquidation of the indebtedness, and then computed the interest on payments up to the same time, deducting the latter amount from the principal and interest."

it has been held that equity will relieve in favor of the injured party.¹ A recovery at law has also been allowed.²

6. REMITTITUR OF INTEREST ERRONEOUSLY ALLOWED. — Where interest has been erroneously allowed in a judgment, but the amount of interest so given is ascertainable by computation alone, the judgment will not, in general, be reversed therefor, but an option to remit such sum will be given to the prevailing party.³ In other cases it has been held that the error may be corrected by the appellate court and judgment rendered for the proper amount;⁴ and the judgment has been remanded with a direction to the trial court to make the proper order in the case, when so made, the judgment to stand affirmed.⁵

4. Application of Payments. — The general rule as stated and fully considered elsewhere in this work is that payments made by a debtor will be applied first in extinguishment of accrued interest and next in reduction of the interest-bearing principal.⁶

Where There Is Interest on Interest Due, payments will be applied first in discharge of the secondary interest, next in discharge of the interest on the principal debt, and last in reduction of the latter sum.⁷

When a Higher Rate of Interest than the Law Allows Has Been Paid, the excess of the payments above the legal rate will be applied in reduction of the principal; but when the payments have been made specifically as interest at a rate higher than the law requires in the absence of contract, but which it does not pro-

Contrary Doctrine. — Evans v. Irvin, 1 Port. (Ala.) 390; Frank v. Morrison, 55 Md. 399. But compare Hunt v. Mayfield, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 124.

Doctrine of De Minimis. — In the case of Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 56, the action was to recover for services rendered. The claim was unliquidated and contested. The referee allowed interest upon the balance found by him from the time when the plaintiff left the defendant's service and demanded his pay. The action was commenced in about a month after such demand was made, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest at least from the commencement of the action, and that if there was any error in allowing interest from the earlier date it was too trifling to require correction. 4. Judgment Corrected by Appellate Court. — Crawford v. Mail, etc., Pub. Co., 22 N. Y. App. Div. 54. Compare Insurance Co. of North America v. Forcheimer, 86 Ala. 541.

Verdict in Lump Sum. — Where the jury was erroneously instructed to allow interest in a case where the giving of interest was properly within its discretion, it was held that as the verdict was for a lump sum, a modification thereof by a deduction of the interest could not be made, but the judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted. King v. Southern Pac. Co., 109 Cal. 96.

5. Remand for Correction in Trial Court. — Where the Only Error Is in Allowing Interest, the amount of which may be ascertained by computation, the judgment will not be reversed in toto and a new trial ordered, but the court below will be directed to enter a judgment such as should have been entered in the first place. *Pacific Postal Tel. 6. Application of Payments. — See the title APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS, vol. 2, p. 467.

Agreement that Principal Shall Be First Paid. — Where a party owes a debt consisting of principal and interest, and it is agreed between him and his creditor that the principal shall be first paid, payments made will be applied accordingly. Pindall v. Marietta Bank, 10 Leigh (Va.) 502.

hibit, the principal should not be credited by the excess of payments above the legal rate.¹

5. Recovery Back of Interest Voluntarily Paid. — Although interest as paid by the debtor might not have been exacted by the creditor in an action against the former, yet if voluntarily paid and not in violation of law, it cannot, in general, be recovered back.²

IX. TIME FROM WHICH COMPUTED — 1. In General. — In order to the allowance of interest, it is, of course, necessary that the time from which the interest is to be computed should be ascertained.³

2. Interest by Contract — a. WHERE DATE EXPRESSLY FIXED — (1) In General. — Where the contract sued on expressly fixes the date from which interest is to be computed, such stipulation will, as a rule, control.⁴ But although it is provided in a promissory note that interest shall not begin to run until a specified day after maturity, yet the judgment in an action brought thereon will bear interest though rendered before the date at which, according to the terms of the note, interest was to begin to run.⁵

(2) Interest "After Maturity" — Days of Grace. — Where a promissory note payable on a certain day stipulates for interest "after maturity," interest should be computed from the day fixed for payment, and not from the last day of grace.⁶

(3) Date Dependent upon Condition. — Where a contract provides for interest at a specified rate if not paid at maturity, but without expressly stating whether in the event of default the interest is to be calculated from the maturity or the date of the contract, the general rule is that if the rate stipulated for is higher than the legal rate, the interest should begin at the maturity of the contract, whereas if it is less or no greater than the legal rate, interest should be computed from the date of the contract.⁷

Where a Creditor in a Contract for the Payment of Money in which the rate of interest is not stipulated, in the application of payments made thereon, first calculates the interest at a rate higher than the legal rate, the excess above the legal rate will, in an action on the contract, be applied in reduction of the principal. Godfrey v. Graycraft, 81 Ind. 476.

Payment under Protest. — Where, by reason of a mistake of the defendant's bookkeeper, which mistake was known to the plaintiff, the defendant for several years failed to demand and collect an amount due to it from the plaintiff, the interest on which was subsequently paid by the plaintiff under protest, it was held that the defendant was entitled to retain the interest on the item for the time during which it so remained uncollected. Davis Provision Co. v. Fowler, (Supm. Ct. App. Div.) 47 N. Y. Supp. 205, 20 N. Y. App. Div. 626.

4. Commencement of Period Fixed by Contract. — The Note Sued On Contained a Printed Stipulation, "with ten per cent. interest after maturity." This had been changed by writing in, "payable at six per cent. interest." It was held that the effect of this provision was to make the new note draw interest at the substituted rate after maturity, but not to change the date from which interest was to be computed. Stayner v. Knowler, 82 Ind. 157. See also Calhoun v. Reynolds, 1 McMull L. (S. Car.) 304; Ellis v. Sanders, 32 S. Car. 584, 10 S. E. Rep. 824.

Interest from Date — Date Omitted. — Where a note as drawn bears interest from date, but the date is omitted, the date of its delivery may be proved, from which time interest may be computed. Richardson v. Ellett, 10 Tex. 190.

b. WHERE DATE IMPLIEDLY FIXED — (1) In General. — The date from which the interest is to run may be, and frequently is, established by implication from the terms of the contract.¹

(2) Money Paid at Another's Request. — Where money is paid at the request and for the use of another, it is proper, in general, to compute interest on the sum so paid from the date of its disbursement, as on an implied contract to pay interest from such date.²

(3) Contracts to Pay at Stated Time "with Interest". — The general rule at present is that where there is a contract to pay money at a stated time "with interest," interest may be computed from the date of the contract, rather than from the maturity thereof.³ This is in accordance with the rule of construction of contracts by which the stipulations thereof should be held to mean something rather than nothing, because the contract would bear interest after maturity though there were no stipulation.⁴

A Note for a Specified Amount with Interest, given for the purchase price of a horse under a contract providing for the return of the horse if not as warranted, with a credit indorsed thereon by reason of the taking of another and less valuable horse in exchange for the one first sold, the latter not conforming to the warranty, bears interest from its execution, and not merely from the date of the exchange. Elwood v. McDill, 105 Iowa 437.

Upon a Contract to Pay a Sum of Money in Instalments, payments to begin at a future time and to be made semiannually with interest, interest begins to run from the execution of the contract. Conners v. Holland, 113 Mass. 50.

A contract for the sale of a mill provided that the vendor should receive a sum named, a portion of which was payable in instalments maturing in six, eighteen, and twenty-four months, with interest "on the whole amount due at ten per cent. annually." It was held that the word "due" should be construed to mean unpaid, and that interest should be computed from the date of the contract, and not merely from the maturity of the several instalments. Adairs v. Wright, 14 Iowa 22.

for the breach of a contract should be computed from the date of the breach;¹ or, as some cases express it, from the accrual of the right of action.² But this rule is sometimes subject to qualification where the damages recoverable are uncertain and unliquidated.³

(2) Contracts to Pay Money — (a) Express Contracts — aa. GENERAL RULE. — Where the contract sued on provides for the payment of money at a certain time, interest as damages should be computed from the time when the principal debt should have been paid,⁴ unless the contract itself fixes the time from which interest is to run.⁵

Date Ascertainable by Implication. — The rule that a contract for the payment of money draws interest from the time when the principal sum due becomes payable applies not only when the time of payment is fixed by the express terms of the contract, but also when it is fixed by implication, as in the case of goods sold and delivered or work done without expressly specifying the time of pay-

In a contract for work interest on the price usually begins to run from the fulfilment of the agreement, Smith v. Buffalo, (Supm. Ct. Spec. T.) 39 N. Y. Supp. 881; or from the time when the ascertained amount became due, Carpenter v. Brand, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 551.

Interest from Completion of Work though Amount Due in Dispute. — Where, though the price for certain work is definitely fixed by contract, and is payable on the completion of the work, the total amount to become due depends on the quantity of material required by the enterprise, which is only approximated, the debtor is nevertheless liable for interest from the time of the completion of the work though the contractor's claim was contested in good faith. on the balance of an account after the expiration of a reasonable period of credit.¹

Foreign Judgments. — In an action on a foreign judgment interest should be computed from the date of the judgment sued on.²

Penal Bonds. — Interest on the penalty of a bond is to be computed, according to some cases, from the time of the breach of the condition;³ but the weight of authority seems to be that interest in such cases, especially as against sureties, should be computed only from the time of a demand or the institution of suit.⁴

bb. WHERE NO TIME FOR PAYMENT OF PRINCIPAL FIXED. — Where there is a contract for the payment of money, but the time therefor is not fixed, it becomes due immediately, and interest will be allowed as damages for the breach of contract from the date of its execution.⁵

cc. CONTRACTS TO PAY ON CONDITION. — Where there is no stipulation for interest and the principal sum is payable only on a contingency, interest should be computed only from the happening thereof.⁶

dd. DEBTS DUE "ON DEMAND." — Where there is a contract to pay a stated sum of money "on demand," the cases are not agreed whether interest should be computed from the date of the contract or only from the date of demand made for payment of the principal.⁷

Interest from Date. — The doctrine of some authorities is that though a note is expressly made payable on demand, yet interest may be recovered from its date, on the ground that a debt so evidenced is a debt due presently, upon which an action may be maintained without showing a prior demand.⁸

Interest from Demand. — Other cases hold broadly that interest on such instruments can be computed only from the date of demand.⁹

Interest from Reasonable Time After Statement of Account. — It has been held that, where an account has been rendered and has been received and retained by the defendant, without objection, for so long a time as to justify a finding that the defendant acquiesced in it, interest will run only from the time when it became an account stated. Bainbridge v. Wilcocks, Baldw. (U. S.) 536. Compare Case v. Hotchkiss, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 334, holding that interest should run from the rendition of the account.

Where Demand in Fact Necessary to Default. — Where, however, the circumstances show that a demand was in fact contemplated by the parties, or where a demand is necessary to put the defendant in default, interest can, of course, be computed only from demand made.¹

(b) Implied Contracts — aa. GENERAL RULE. — With reference to the date from which interest is computed there is no distinction between implied and express contracts for money. That is, where the law, by fiction or implication, creates a contract to pay a certain sum at a time fixed upon, interest is properly to be computed from such date upon a breach of the implied contract.²

bb. DEBTS ADMITTED TO BE DUE. — Where a contract operates as an admission of an existing debt for a good consideration, the law implies a promise to pay it; and if there is no time specified for the payment thereof, the law makes it payable immediately, and interest may be computed from the date at which the debt is admitted to be due.³

cc. IMPLICATION TO PAY ON DEMAND. — There are many instances in which it is proper to compute interest from demand made for the payment of the principal and only from such time, where the undertaking to pay on demand is only implied, or where a demand is necessary to put the debtor in default.⁴

Y.) 308, it was said that a promissory note in which no time of payment is fixed is, in the judgment of the law, payable on demand, and draws interest from its date.

Note Payable "When Wanted." — It has been held that a note stipulating for the payment of the principal "when wanted" does not draw interest until after a demand. Goodwin v. Hazzard, 1 Ind. 514.

Duebill for Money Loaned. — A duebill payable on demand bears interest only from demand made and not from the date, unless so expressed, although specified to be for the loan of money made on the day of the date. Schmidt v. Limehouse, 2 Bailey L. (S. Car.) 277. See also Hunter v. Wood, 54 Ala. 71.

Value Received — Money Lent. — It has been intimated that while a note due on demand for "value received" will not bear interest from date, but only from demand made, the rule might be different if the instrument recited an indebtedness for "money lent," the former phrase, it was held, not being equivalent to the latter. Rayne v. Guthrie, Add. (Pa.) 137.

Goods Sold. — If no time for payment of the price of goods sold is fixed, interest thereon may be recovered from the date of demand.

(o) Under Special Statutes. — In some jurisdictions statutory provision has been made for the time from which interest is to be calculated on particular contracts or obligations.¹

(3) Interest from Institution of Suit. — In many cases of contracts express or implied to pay money it has been held that interest is recoverable only from the institution of the suit.² These cases, in the main, are such as involve unliquidated amounts, or cases in which the time for the payment of the principal has not been fixed, or both; or, in other words, cases where a demand is necessary to set interest running, and the institution of the suit operates as a demand.

Statutory Provision as to Vexatious Delay. — Where interest is warranted on account of vexatious delay, it is to be allowed from the time when payment was due, and not merely from the date on which the delay became vexatious. Chicago v. Tebbetts, 104 U. S. 120.

Statute Regulating Debt of Municipal Corporation. — A debt due to a contractor by the city bears interest as against the latter only from the date of the adjudication of the invalidity of an assessment primarily liable therefor, under a statute providing that the city shall be liable to the contractor only in case an assessment levied on property owners to pay the debt should be declared by the courts to be invalid. Gafney v. San Francisco, 72 Cal. 146.

The Price Which a City Agrees to Pay for Municipal Improvement becomes due, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, on the acceptance of the work. Murphy v. Omaha, 33 Neb. 402.

In a Suit by the Creditors of an Insolvent Corporation to subject the stockholders therein to a special statutory liability in excess of the value of their stock, it was held that interest should be allowed from the date of the confirmation of the report of the referee under a code provision (now Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 2627) that all contracts, express or implied, for the payment of money shall bear interest from the date when such money should have been paid. *National Commercial Bank v. Institution of Suit as Setting Interest Running When Demand Would Not. — Some cases hold that the institution of a suit will operate to liquidate a claim so as to warrant a recovery of interest subsequently accruing when a mere demand in pais would not have such effect,¹ but in other cases this is denied, and interest is allowed only from the ascertainment of the amount by verdict or judgment.²

(4) Contracts to Do Something Other than to Pay Money. — Where the contract in suit was not to pay money, but to do some collateral thing, it has been held that interest might be recovered from the date of the breach.³ In some such cases, however, courts have held that interest was recoverable only from the institution of the suit,⁴ while in other cases the running of interest has been deferred until after the liquidation of the demand by verdict or judgment.⁵

b. FOR TORT — (1) In General. — Interest as part of the compensation in an action for damages for tort is, as a rule, allowed from the commission of the tort.⁶

Thus, Where Money Has Been Converted by the Defendant, interest should, in general, be computed from the date of the conversion.⁷

Waiver of Tort and Suit in Assumpsit. — Where a defendant converts personality and sells it, but the owner thereof waives the tort and proceeds in assumpsit for money had and received, interest is not recoverable from the date of the conversion or from the receipt of the proceeds of the property, but only from the date of the institution of the suit. Dougherty v. Chapman, 29 Mo. App. 233. See also Finlay v. Bryson, 84 Mo. 670.

Interest on Value of Property Fraudulently Converted. — In an action by a creditor to recover the value of property fraudulently transferred by a debtor, interest is recoverable, not from the date of the transfer to the time of the trial, but only from the time of levy or other proceeding by the creditor to establish a lien. Bresnahan v. Nugent, 97 Mich. 359.

In Massachusetts it seems to have been announced as a general rule that where a debt is not payable at an earlier time, interest upon the amount found due is to be allowed from the date of the writ. Quin v. Bay State Distilling Co., 171 Mass. 283, citing Dodge v. Perkins, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 369; Foote v. Blanchard, 6 Allen (Mass.) 221, 83 Am. Dec. 624.

Where Damages Are Awarded for Breach of Contract, and no interest is included in the several amounts allowed to the plaintiff, although interest was asked for by the conclusion of the declaration, and it appears from the evidence that these amounts are really the minimum estimate of the damages suffered, as they existed at the date of the institution of the action, the plaintiff is entitled to interest from the date of service in the action on the total amount awarded to him by the judgment; and where such interest is not awarded by the court below, the omission will be rectified on appeal. *Montreal Gas Co. v. And Where the Conversion Is of Property Other than Money the same rule as to the computation of interest will apply.¹

Where Money Has Been Fraudulently or Wrongfully Obtained interest may, in general, be computed from the date when it was so obtained.²

(2) Injuries to Property — (a) Interest from Date of Injuries. — It is obvious that where only the value of property injured or destroyed at the time of the commission of the tort is given in an action for damages therefor, interest as part of the compensation to which the injured party is entitled should be computed from the date of the loss.³

(b) Interest from Institution of Suit. — But in some instances, interest in such cases has been given only from the date of the institution of the action.⁴

(c) Interest from Judgment. — The doctrine of some cases, however, is that interest on an unliquidated demand for damages to property should be allowed only from the date of the judgment which liquidates the debt.⁵

X. TO WHAT TIME COMPUTED — 1. Interest by Contract. — If it is provided by the contract, or if an implication arises from its terms, that interest shall be computed up to a given time or that no interest shall be computed after such time, the recovery of interest will be governed accordingly.⁶

Misappropriation of Funds — Presumption as to Time of Conversion. — In an action against a clerk for the misappropriation of funds, if the defendant does not show when the misappropriation occurred it will be presumed to have been when the money was received, and interest will be allowed from that time. *Presson v. 2. Interest as Damages. — Interest as damages, whether as liquidated by the parties, where the contract provides for interest after breach, or merely as damages by a fixed legal measure for breach of contract, or as part of the compensation in tort, is generally computed to the rendition of the judgment in the action.¹ Then the contract or liability for tort becomes merged in the judgment, and thereafter the accrual of interest is regulated by doctrines fully discussed elsewhere.²

XI. RATE OF INTEREST — 1. Generally. — The rate of interest recoverable is largely a matter of statutory regulation, and in some states has been made the subject of special constitutional provisions.³

2. Rate by Contract — a. EXPRESS CONTRACTS FOR RATE — (1) In General. — It is clear that a rate of interest expressly contracted for, not in excess of the rate allowed by law, is recoverable,⁴ and it has been said that in the absence of statutory provision any rate contracted for, however exorbitant, is recoverable, provided it is not stipulated for as a penalty.⁵

(2) Contracts Increasing Rate — (a) In General. — Where a debt is past due, indulgence to the debtor in the matter of payment is a sufficient consideration to support a contract for an increased rate of interest,⁶ and it has been held

1. Interest as Damages — Computation to Rendition of Judgment. — Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. McAlpine, etc., Co., 75 Ala. 113; Chafin v. Rich, 92 Cal. 471; Lamprey v. Mason, 148 Mass. 231; Thorn v. Smith, 71 Wis. 18.

Interest to Date of Levy of Execution. — Interest on a judgment satisfied by an execution upon property should be computed only to the day when the levy was made and the property taken, and not to the time of the subsequent completion of the levy. Brown v. Lunt, 37 Me. 423.

In Sheriff's Sales interest is allowed on liens only to the day of the sale, the property being then taken from the defendant and the lien in contemplation of the law discharged. Siter's Appeal, 26 Pa. St. 178. See also Potter v. Langstrath, 151 Pa. St. 216; Allen v. Oxnard, 152 Pa. St. 621; Meals's Estate, 13 Phila. (Pa.) 558, 35 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 368.

A Mortgage Creditor of a Decedent whose estate is solvent, it has been held, and whose land has been sold by order of the Orphans' Court for the payment of debts, may recover interest on his accompanying bond after the confirmation of such sale and until the date of payment. But it would be otherwise if the estate were insolvent. Yeatman's Appeal, 102 Pa. St. 297.

Where Property Sold Insufficient to Pay Debts. — It has been said that in Maryland, according to the usual course of the Court of Chancery, where the proceeds of property the sale of which is ordered for the payment of debts are insufficient to pay all the creditors, the interest on the various claims should be calculated only up to the date of sale. Strike v. McDonald, 2 Har. & G. (Md.) 199.

2. See the title JUDGMENTS AND DECREES.

In Rendering Judgment on Money Demands it is usual to compute interest on the principal up to the date of the judgment and to give judgment for the aggregate, which latter sum will bear interest or not, as the case may be, under the law regulating interest on judgments. Stanton v. Woodcock, 19 Ind. 273.

3. Rate of Interest Regulated by Statute. — See the various local codes and statutes.

A statute forbidding a loan corporation to charge more than the "legal rate" of interest does not restrict it to the legal rate of the state in which it was incorporated, but it may lend money in other states and receive interest at the rates prevailing by law in such states. U. S. Mortgage Co. v. Sperry, 138 U. S. 313.

The Constitution of Virginia declares that "upon debts hereafter contracted it shall be lawful to receive any rate of interest, not exceeding twelve per centum per annum, which may be agreed upon by the parties and be specified in the bond, note, or other writing evidencing the debt. When there is no such agreement the rate of interest shall be six per centum per annum for use and forbearance of every hundred dollars." Cecil v. Hicks, 29 Gratt (Va.) 1, 26 Am. Rep. 391.

4. Right to Contract for Rate of Interest. — Trippe v. Wynne, 76 Ga. 200. And see Cloud v. Rivord, 6 Wash. 555.

Where the Charter of a State Depository for Court Moneys provides for the payment of a stipulated rate of interest on the money so held, an agreement for a lower rate with the parties to a suit is invalid. The power to change the rate, it was held, is vested solely in the court, and when the order with reference to the deposit is silent in this respect the charter rate of the depository will apply. National Bank v. Hankinson, 33 Fed. Rep. 561.

also that future indulgence will support a contract for an increased rate of interest to be computed from a date already past.¹

Such a Contract Must Be in Writing in some jurisdictions, if the increase goes beyond a certain rate.²

(b) Debts Secured by Mortgage. — Where the debt is secured by a mortgage on lands, some question has been made as to the effect of an undertaking by the mortgagor to pay an increased rate of interest, as enlarging the lien of the mortgage, both as against the mortgagor and against purchasers from him of the property mortgaged.³

(c) Stipulation for Higher Rate After Maturity — aa. IN GENERAL. — There is much conflict among the cases as to the precise effect of a stipulation for a higher rate of interest after the maturity of the principal and a default in the payment thereof; but most of the authorities turn, one way or another, upon the question whether a provision of this character is a mere liquidation by the parties of the damages upon a breach of the contract or is to be regarded as a penalty for the breach thereof.⁴

bb. DOCTRINE THAT HIGHER RATE RECOVERABLE — (aa) In General. — By the weight of authority a stipulation for a higher rate of interest after maturity is valid and enforceable, provided the increased rate which it is sought to recover does not exceed the highest rate allowed by law;⁵ and in the absence of a statute limiting the rate which may be contracted for, or where the rate provided for after maturity is not unlawful, a stipulation for a higher rate after maturity will

4. See the title LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Whether the sum named as interest in an agreement to secure performance is to be treated as liquidated damages or as a penalty depends on the intention of the parties. Reeves v. Stipp, 91 Ill. 609.

Question as Affected by Phraseology of Contract. — It has been held that where a contract for the payment of money provides for a certain rate of interest, but also stipulates that if the payor shall discharge the obligation at maturity the obligee will accept a lower rate of interest than stated, the contract will be enforceable according to its terms. Powis v. Maynard, 3 Ark. 519; Waller v. Long, 6 Munf. (Va.) 71. See also Seton v. Slide, 7 Ves. Jr. 273; Brown v. Barkham, 1 P. Wms. 652; Brockway v. Clark, 6 Ohio 45; Longworth v. Askren, 15 Ohio St. 370.

Rule Restricting Rate to Reasonable Compensation. — It has been held that the stipulation of the parties as to the rate of interest after maturity may be accepted as the measure of damages, provided they adhere to what may be reasonably sufficient to compensate the loss arising from the breach of contract. Such a stipulation may be regarded as a penalty for the nonpayment of the principal sum, if the rate so agreed on is greatly in excess of the real value of the money. Browne v. Sieck, 2 Colo. 70. Compare Buckingham v. Orr, 6 Colo. 537.

Rate After Declared Maturity. — It has been held that where a promissory note bearing ten per cent. per annum interest before maturity provides that it shall bear interest at the rate of four per cent. per month after maturity, such contract for an increased rate of interest applies to the definite time set for the payment of the note, and not to the declared maturity arising by reason of a default in the payment of any instalment of interest. Cloud v. Rivord, 6 Wash. 555.

generally be considered as a liquidation of the damages rather than as a penalty for a breach.¹

Stipulation for Interest as Such or as Damages. — Some cases, however, have maintained that a statute limiting the rate which may be contracted for as interest does not restrict the rate which may be stipulated for as damages.²

(bb) Waiver of Higher Rate by Acceptance of Lower. — It has been held that where a debtor contracts to pay a higher rate of interest after the maturity of the principal debt if default is made in the payment thereof, the acceptance of the lower rate may be evidence of a contract to waive the higher.³

cc. DOCTRINE THAT HIGHER RATE NOT RECOVERABLE. — It is held in some cases that a provision for a higher rate of interest after the maturity and nonpayment of the principal debt imposes a penalty for default and is therefore not enforceable, or will be relieved against in equity.⁴

dd. INTEREST FROM DATE IF NOT PAID AT MATURITY. — Some cases hold that a contract providing that if the debt is not paid at maturity it shall thereafter bear interest at an increased rate imposes a penalty, and should not be enforced,⁵ while other decisions maintain a contrary view.⁶

The Illinois Statute now provides that a contract for a greater rate of interest than the law permits, though after maturity and in order to insure the prompt payment of the debt, is not enforceable. Barton v. Farmers, etc., Nat. Bank, 122 Ill. 352. And see Starr & Curt. Annot. Stat. Ill. (1896). c. 74, par. 6.

Rule of Minnesota Cases. — In Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 350, 72 Am. Dec. 102, which was an action on a note stipulating for three per cent. per month interest until maturity, and thereafter in case of default five per cent. per month, it was held that the increased rate after maturity was in the nature of a penalty and not recoverable, but that damages computed according to the contract rate before maturity, and not the legal rate, might be given.

In Talcott v. Marston, 3 Minn. 339, where notes stipulated for interest at five per cent. per month after maturity, it was held that the proper measure of recovery in all these notes was interest at seven per cent., the legal rate. See also Kent v. Bown, 3 Minn. 347; Daniels v. Ward, 4 Minn. 168.

Newell v. Houlton, 22 Minn. 19, was decided after the enactment of a statute providing that interest should be at the rate of seven per cent. per annum unless a different rate was contracted for in writing, and all contracts should bear the same rate after due as before if it clearly appeared that such was the intention of the parties. The effect of this statute was held to be to restore the doctrine of Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 350, 72 Am. Dec. 102, "modified in one particular — that is, that the parties should express in the contract their intention that the rate reserved before due should be the rate after due, or the measure of damages on a breach." And see Holbrook v. Sims, 39 Minn. 122.

Doctrine as Affected by Phraseology of Contract.

— It has been held that a note stipulating for the payment of interest from date, but containing a provision that if the principal is promptly paid the payee will remit the interest, draws interest from date according to its terms if the condition upon which the interest is to be deducted is not complied with. Ely v. Wither- spoon, 2 Ala. 131.

6. Contrary Doctrine — Arkansas. — Portis v. Merrill, 33 Ark. 416.

Indiana. — Hackenberry v. Shaw, 11 Ind.

(3) Contracts Reducing Rate. — An agreement between the parties reducing the rate of interest payable on a loan is enforceable if supported by a legal consideration and not lacking in other essentials to a valid contract.¹

Reduction by Parol. — Some cases have held that the rate of interest borne by a written contract cannot be reduced by parol,² while on the other hand it has been held that such an agreement is valid only when it is founded on a valuable consideration.³

b. IMPLIED CONTRACTS FOR RATE — (1) In General. — In the absence of conflict with a statute requiring that contracts for interest above a prescribed rate shall be in writing,⁴ a contract to pay a particular rate of interest may well arise by implication from the usage of trade, the conduct of the parties, etc.⁵ A mere change, however, in the form of the security for a debt for money loaned will not operate to change the rate of interest to be paid from that reserved in the original contract.⁶

(2) Contract for Interest Without Expressing Rate. — Where there is a stipulation for interest, but the rate is not specified, the law will presume that the legal rate was intended.⁷

Increased Rate from Date if Not Paid at Maturity. — A provision in a note for interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, provided the note is paid when due, but if not then paid the interest to be at an increased rate from the date of the note, is a valid and enforceable contract for interest and not a provision for a penalty. Finger v. McCaughey, 114 Cal. 64.

Doctrine that Defendant's Default Must Be Strictly Proved. — Where a note is made payable at a future period with interest from date if not punctually paid, such interest is in the nature of a penalty for not punctually performing the principal obligation, and the default of the debtor must be strictly proved to recover the additional interest. Glover v. Doty, 1 Rob. (La.) 130.

1. Contracts Reducing Rate of Interest. — Tousey v. Moore, 79 Mich. 564; Vereycken v. Vandenberg, 102 Mich. 119.

Agreement to Waive All Interest. — An agreement on the part of the payee of a promissory note past due to waive all interest thereon on the receipt of new notes evidencing the same debt is valid and enforceable as based upon a good and sufficient consideration. Roberts v. Carter, 31 Ill. App. 142.

3. Necessity of Consideration. — Dudley v. Reynolds, 1 Kan. 285.

A written agreement by the payee of a promissory note to take a lower rate of interest on a specified date will be presumed to have been founded on a valid consideration and will be held binding, unless such presumption is rebutted or the contract is shown to be invalid for other reasons. Warren v. Johnson, 38 Kan. 768. See generally the title CONSIDERATION, vol. 6, p. 667.

Note to Bank as Payee — Charter Rate. — In case of a note executed to a bank as payee, payable without interest in the absence of default at maturity, it will be inferred that the contract was made with reference to the bank's charter, and the rate of interest fixed therein will govern. Consolidated Assoc. Bank v. Foucher, 9 La. 476.

Where Terms Meaningless or Intelligible. — Where the terms of a note which stipulates for interest are meaningless or unintelligible as to the rate, the legal rate may be given.¹

Ambiguity. — Similarly it has been held that more than legal interest is not recoverable on a contract the terms of which are so ambiguous that it cannot be said with reasonable certainty that more than the legal rate was intended.²

3. Rate as Damages — a. GENERAL RULE — LEGAL RATE. — Where there is no contract for interest, and interest is given as damages strictly, the general rule is that the legal rate is recoverable.³

A Surety Who Discharges a Note of His Principal bearing interest at the rate of three per cent. per month is not entitled in an action against the principal to recover damages at

b. EXCEPTIONS TO GENERAL RULE. — Where there is a contract to invest money at a specified rate of interest which exceeds the legal rate, or where there has been fraud or a breach of trust, and the delinquent party has actually made more than the legal rate of interest on the other's money, a higher rate than the legal rate will be allowed.¹

c. WHERE NO LEGAL RATE EXISTS. — It has been held that if there is no statute for interest, damages for delay in the payment of money due in lieu of interest may be given by the jury in its discretion under proper proof.²

4. Rate After Maturity — a. IN GENERAL. — There is considerable conflict of authority as to the rate of interest recoverable after maturity where the contract, though stipulating for interest and specifying a rate, makes no provision for interest after default in the payment of the principal sum when due.³

b. RULE OF INTENT OF PARTIES — (1) Generally. — As a matter of course, where the intent of the parties as to the rate after maturity is expressed in the contract, such rate, if not illegal, will in general control.⁴

the rate of interest which the note bears, but can recover only at the legal rate in the absence of contract. Smith v. Johnson, 23 Cal. 63.

In an Action for Damages for Deceit against a person assuming authority as agent to sell land, the only damages recoverable on account of the plaintiff's holding idle the money which he had procured to purchase the land is the legal interest thereon, although the securities which the plaintiff converted into the money for the purpose of making the purchase bore a greater interest. Place v. Dodge, 54 Ill. App. 167.

Breach of Warranty. — In an action by the vendee to recover damages for breach of warranty in the sale of a chattel, interest is recoverable as damages at the legal rate only, though the notes for the purchase price bear a higher rate. Thoreson v. Minneapolis Harvester Works, 29 Minn. 341. And see Minneapolis Harvester Works v. Bonnallie, 29 Minn. 373.

Liquidated Accounts bear interest at the legal rate. Ross v. Smith, 113 Ind. 242; Henderson Cotton Mfg. Co. v. Lowell Mach. Shops, 86 Ky. 676.

Rule under Bills of Exchange Act. — By sections 57 and 88 of the English Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the interest accruing due after the date of maturity of a promissory note is recoverable by statute as liquidated damages, and is to be calculated at the rate of six per cent. per annum, in the absence of a contract for a different rate. London, etc., Bank v. Clancarty, (1892) 1 Q. B. 689; Lawrence v. Willcocks, (1892) 1 Q. B. 696.

1. Allowance Exceeding Legal Rate — Contract to Invest Money. — Attorneys who received money under a contract to invest it at ten per cent. interest, but, failing to invest it all, used a part of the balance themselves, have been held properly chargeable with interest at ten per cent. on the amount so used and seven per cent. on the amount not invested or used. *Rogers v. which damages in analogous cases are determined — by proof of the market value of money. Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 350, 72 Am. Dec. 102.

3. Rate After Maturity — Conflict of Authority Noticed. — Jefferson County v. Lewis, 20 Fla. 980, in which case it was said that the preponderance of opinion is in favor of the doctrine that the stipulated rate attends the contract until it is satisfied or merged in judgment. Question of Local Law. — The rule as to the rate of interest after maturity on a contract making no provision for interest after due, has been held to be always one of local law. Holden v. Freedman's Sav., etc., Co., 100 U. S. 72.

Where No Statutory Rate. — Where there is no statutory rate, it has been held that a note bearing two per cent. per month would not necessarily warrant a recovery of interest as damages at the contract rate after maturity, the damages, by way of interest or otherwise, being for the jury under the evidence. Perry v. Taylor, 1 Utah 63.

Contract for Rate Named until Principal Paid.

Where a Party Who Had Assumed the Payment of Certain Bonds making no provision for interest after maturity notified the holders thereof that if they would not insist on prompt payment at maturity the rate of interest specified in the bonds as payable before maturity would continue to be paid thereafter, it was held that such rate was recoverable after maturity where the holders forbore to press payment on the faith of such representation. Kelley v. Phenix Nat. Bank, 17 N. Y. App. Div. 496.

Extension of Note at Reduced Rate — Expiration of Period of Extension. — Where a note expressly provided for ten per cent. interest after maturity, but the time of payment was extended by agreement for a certain time at a lower rate, it was held that after the expiration of the time of extension the note would bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. North v. Walker, 66 Mo. 453.

Contract for Rate Named until Principal Payable. — A contract for the payment of money at a stipulated rate of interest until the time when the principal sum will be payable bears the legal rate only after maturity. Spaulding v. Lord, 19 Wis. 533.

Short-time Loans with Provision for Annual Interest. — Where a contract for the payment of money provides for the payment of the principal debt within a year or less than two years, but also stipulates for the payment of interest annually, such stipulation will be taken to indicate an intent that the principal sum is not to be paid when due, but that it is to continue unpaid with an annual payment of interest. Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. Car. 73, 42 Am. Rep. 632. See also Vaughan v. Kennan, 38 Ark. 116.

So, too, where a mortgage to a savings bank is made payable in one year, providing for interest on the first day of January and July of each year, the rate stipulated for therein, though higher than the legal rate, will continue until the debt is paid or merged in a judgment. Wilcox v. Van Voorhis, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 575.

Where No Time for Payment of Principal Set. —

Where a note bore interest at a rate higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract, but no time for payment was stipulated, it was held that the contract rate was recoverable until paid. Paine v. Caswell, 68 Me. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 21; O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64.

Construction of Particular Agreement. — In State Bank v. Stickney, 5 Ill. 4, it appeared that the plaintiffs were indebted to the defendant bank by notes bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. and secured by a mortgage on a stock of merchandise, and that the bank was authorized, if it should deem such course necessary for its security before the maturity of the notes, to take possession of the property mortgaged, sell it, and apply the proceeds in payment of the notes; the bank being expressly authorized to sell the property "for twelve months' paper." The bank, pursuant to such mortgage and agreement, took possession of the property and sold it, taking notes payable in twelve months, with interest after six months at the rate of six per cent. per annum. It was held that in settling with the plaintiffs the bank was entitled to interest on the latter's notes bearing eight per cent. per annum, up to the maturity of the notes taken for the purchase price of the property sold, the bank, however, accounting for the sales notes with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum for the six months preceding their maturity, as provided.

(2) Demand and One-day Notes. — Where a note due on demand bears a rate of interest which is lawful, but higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract, it will, in general, bear the contract rate until paid;¹ because, since such a note is due immediately, it is not to be supposed that the parties intended the contract rate to be paid only until maturity.²

Where a Note Is Due One Day After Date, and the rate of interest stipulated for is higher than the rate prescribed by law in the absence of contract, it is generally held that there may be a recovery of the conventional rate until payment of the principal sum or merger of the contract into judgment.³

c. WHERE CONTRACT RATE HIGHER THAN LEGAL RATE — (1) Legal Rate After Maturity. — Where there is no contract for interest after maturity by which the parties have liquidated their damages, it is generally held that only the legal rate should be computed after the principal sum is due, though a rate not unlawful but higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract is provided for until maturity.⁴ If the creditor desires and the parties intend Doctrine that Only Legal Interest Recoverable After Maturity though Higher Rate Expressly Contracted For. — Where a mortgage of real estate provided for payment of the principal money secured on or before a fixed date "with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum until such principal money and interest shall be fully paid and satisfied," it was held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Appeals for Ontario (Grant v. People's Loan, etc., Co., 17 Ont. App. 85), that the mortgage carried interest at the rate of ten per cent. to the time fixed for payment of the principal only, and after that date the mortgagees could recover no more than the statutory rate of six per cent. on the unpaid principal. Peoples Loan, etc., Co. v. Grant, 18 Can. Sup. Ct. 262, following St. John v. Rykert, 10 Can. Sup. Ct. 278.

2. Rationale of Rule. — Paine v. Caswell, 68 Me. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 21.

Rule Not Varied by Particular Statute. — The rule prevails notwithstanding a statute which provides that "any negotiable promissory note payable on demand which remains unpaid four months from its date shall be considered as overdue and dishonored." Seymour v. Continental L. Ins. Co., 44 Conn. 300, 26 Am. Rep. 469.

There is no substantial difference in the matter of interest between a note payable one day after date with annual interest and a note payable on demand with interest at the designated rate or a duebill with like interest. Casteel v. Walker, 40 Ark. 117, 48 Am. Rep. 5. See also Fenley v. Kendall, (Ky. 1892) 18 S. W. Rep. 637; White v. Curd, 86 Ky. 191.

Stipulation that Interest Should Be Paid Annually. — A note payable one day after date "with interest from date at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, interest to be paid annually," bears twelve per cent. interest after maturity as well as before. Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. Car. 341.

Interest at Monthly Rate. — A note payable one day after date "with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month" carries the stipulated rate of interest after as well as before maturity. Piester v. Piester, 22 S. Car. 140, 53 Am. Rep. 711.

Qualification of Rule. — In Smith v. Smith, 33 S. Car. 210, where a promissory note dated February 6, 1874, was payable one day after date and with interest at the rate of one per cent. per month from January 1, 1874, it was held that only the legal rate of interest was recoverable after the maturity of the note, because the instrument in terms bore interest at the contract rate for more than a month before its maturity, thereby enabling the court to place the above construction on it and still give full effect to the terms of the contract.

that the contract rate shall continue after the maturity of the debt, it would, it has been said, be quite easy to include such a stipulation in the contract.¹

(2) Contract Rate After Maturity. — In a number of jurisdictions, however, the rule is well established that where the parties have agreed upon a rate of interest not unlawful, but higher than that provided by law in the absence of contract, the contract rate will prevail after the maturity of the contract, though no reference is made therein to interest after the principal amount is due.²

This case was subsequently overruled by Burns v. Anderson, 68 Ind. 202, 34 Am. Rep. 250, but the rule as set up in this latter case has been in turn repudiated, and the doctrine declared in Kilgore v. Powers was recognized and re-established by the later cases.

The Theory of some of these cases is that as the parties have themselves agreed upon a specific rate of interest as compensation for the use of money, it is just that the law should adopt the same rate as the measure of damages if the money is retained beyond the time fixed by the contract for its return.¹ Others contend that where parties to a contract for money expressly fix the rate of interest before the maturity of the principal debt, there is an implied contract to continue to pay the same rate if the principal is not paid when due.² This latter theory does not conflict in principle with the rule that where there is no contract for a rate after maturity, the legal rate and only

Rate After Declared Maturity. — Where a mortgage is declared due by the mortgagee under a clause providing that the principal debt may be declared due on default in the payment of interest, the rate of interest after such precipitated maturity of the principal continues at the agreed rate and is not reduced to the legal rate of six per cent. per annum. *Cincinnati Hotel Co. v. Creditor's Refusal to State Balance Due. — Where payments have been made on a promissory note bearing interest at a rate higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract, the mere fact that the payee does not, upon request of the maker, render to him a statement of the balance due will not operate to defeat the payee's right to the recovery of the contract rate of interest after the maturity of the note and after the request of the maker as stated. Lamprey v. Mason, 148 Mass. 231.

Rule Applies though New Arrangement Contemplated. — A loan of money was made for two months at two per cent. a month, in contemplation of a new arrangement at the expiration of that time. Doctrine of Implication as Supported by Analogy. — "When a tenant agrees to pay a stipulated rate for one year, and holds over, the law will imply that he is to pay at the same rate during the entire term of occupancy. What is paid for the use of a house is called rent; what is paid for the use of money is called interest. I fail to see why the contract rate of the legal rate is recoverable as damages, because these cases profess to imply a contract for interest after maturity at the same rate that is paid before. Both lines of cases might argue with some plausibility that to admit the contrary doctrine is to allow a delinquent debtor, in a sense, to profit by his own wrong in the retention of the principal at a lower rate of interest after default.¹ But the answer to this is that if a default is contemplated or regarded as probable or possible, it is quite easy for the creditor to stipulate for the agreed rate of interest "until paid," and so avoid all uncertainty in the matter; and if he negligently omits to do this, he should, nevertheless, stand or fall by the terms of the contract as made.²

d. WHERE CONTRACT RATE LOWER THAN LEGAL RATE — (1) In General.

— There is the same conflict in the cases as to the rate recoverable after maturity where the contract rate is lower than the legal rate, as has already been observed where the rate contracted for is higher than the legal rate. To be consistent it would seem that in the jurisdictions where, when the contract rate is higher than the legal rate, the former is allowed on the ground of an implied contract to pay it, the same rule, for the same reason, would prevail when the contract rate is lower than the legal rate. But if the higher rate after maturity is allowed solely because otherwise the debtor would derive benefit from his own default, then this consideration might perhaps give the legal rate after maturity where the pre-existing contract called for a lower rate of interest.

(2) Legal Rate After Maturity. — Where a contract for the payment of money stipulates for a rate of interest lower than the legal rate in the absence of contract, it is believed, in the absence of anything further to show the intent of the parties than the bare agreement for interest before maturity at the rate stated, that the legal rate as damages for a breach should be given.³

interest should not control until the contract is extinguished; or why a man ought to be excused from paying what in his judgment the use of money is worth, as evidenced by his contract, merely because he has failed to pay the money when it was due. If that were the rule, he may find it to his advantage to violate his agreement to pay his debt when it becomes due. The better rule, most consonant with morality as well as law, is that the agreed rate of interest attends the contract until it is satisfied or extinguished." Jefferson County v. Lewis, 20 Fla. 981.

1. Delinquent Debtor Not Allowed to Profit by His Own Wrong. — In Meaders v. Gray, 60 Miss. 400, 45 Am. Rep. 414, the court declared that "to hold that the stipulated rate of interest shall not govern after maturity of the contract would be to disregard the plain intent and common understanding of men in their contracts, to pervert the unmistakable meaning of their language, and unjustly to pay defaulting debtors a premium not contemplated by them, for their default. It is probable that no man ever promised a stipulated rate of interest who did not well understand that it was to be borne as long as the debt was unpaid."

Wisconsin. — Wagner v. Second Ward Sav. Bank, 76 Wis. 242.

Rate on Legacy. — The case of Henderson v. Laurens, 2 Desaus. (S. Car.) 170, was an action brought against an executor to recover a legacy which the testator directed to bear five per cent. interest and be paid at a certain time. The time for its payment having passed, the court decreed that it should be paid with interest at five per cent. up to the time when it was due, and at seven per cent., which was the legal rate, thereafter. See also Spencer v. Maxfield, 16 Wis. 181.

Denial of Debt and Attempt to Conceal Evidence of Indebtedness. — In Lawrence v. Leake, etc., Orphan House, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 577, it appeared that money had been lent at less than the legal rate of interest, with no definite agreement as to when it should be repaid. After the death of the lender and demand of the debt by his representatives, the borrower denied the debt and attempted to conceal evidence of the indebtedness. It was held that this fraudulent

(3) Contract Rate After Maturity. — The rule that where a contract bears a rate of interest lower than the legal rate the latter is, in general, recoverable after maturity, is denied by some courts of high authority, which hold that the contract rate, though lower than the legal rate, will attend the contract until payment of the principal or merger in a judgment.¹

c. RULE UNDER SPECIAL STATUTES — (1) In General. — In some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted for the purpose of setting at rest the disputed question of the rate of interest recoverable after the maturity of a contract for the payment of money, where it is not provided for by the contract itself.²

(2) Judgments and Decrees. — In most jurisdictions the rate of interest recoverable on judgments and decrees for the payment of money is expressly conduct on the part of the borrower was a breach of the contract allowing to him the benefit of the reduced rate of interest, and that legal interest became due from the time of the denial and attempted concealment. See also Cook v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 27.

Where Charter Rate Less than Legal Rate. — In U. S. Bank v. Chapin, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 471, it was held that a bank which was by law limited to six per cent. interest upon all discounts was entitled to recover at the rate of seven per cent. from the time when the debt became due; that the clause in the charter limiting the rate of interest to six per cent. referred only to discounts in the ordinary course of business, and the contract with the bank having been broken, the defendant was liable to pay the rate of interest fixed by the lex loci from the time when the debt became due. See also Kitchen v. Branch Bank, 14 Ala. 233; Lester v. Mobile Bank, 7 Ala. 490; Chambliss v. Robertson, 23 Miss. 302; Tuffli v. Ohio L. Ins., etc., Co., 2 Disney (Ohio) 121.

It Has Been Held that Where a Mortgagee Has Contracted to Receive a Rate of Interest less than the legal rate during the time of credit agreed upon by the parties, and he suffers the mortgagor to remain in possession after the mortgage money becomes due and payable, an understanding between the parties might perhaps be presumed that interest at the agreed rate should continue until the mortgagee should think proper to demand payment. But no such presumption can be indulged where the mortgagee attempts to foreclose his mortgage and take possession of the mortgaged premises under the supposition that he has actually acquired the equity of redemption as a substitute for his debt. Where, therefore, it is sought to make a redemption from the mortgage, the amount due must be computed upon the basis of legal interest. Bell v. New York, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 49.

If a Bank Agrees to Pay Interest on a Deposit at a rate less than the legal rate, the contract rate continues until judgment. Schmidt v. People's Nat. Bank, 153 Mass. 550; Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371.

Where It Was Specially Provided by Statute that notes given for the purchase money of certain public lands should bear interest at a specified rate, less than the legal rate in the absence of contract, it was held that the rule applied as well in computing the interest for the time after as before the maturity of the note. Branch Bank v. Harrison, 1 Ala. 9. And where a statute authorized the issuance of state bonds bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. payable semiannually, it was held that a bond would bear the same rate of interest after maturity as before. Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 22 Am. St. Rep. 624.

2. Rate After Maturity Fixed by Statute — California. — The California statute provides that "unless there is an express contract in writing fixing a different rate, interest is payable on all moneys at the legal rate of seven per cent. per annum after they become due on any instrument of writing." Civ. Code Cal., § 1917; Nash v. El Dorado County, 24 Fed. Rep. 252.

Kansas. — In Kansas it is provided that when a rate of interest is specified in a contract, such rate shall continue until full payment is made. Laws Kan. 1889, c. 164, § 5; Getto v. Friend, 46 Kan. 24.

Kentucky. — The Kentucky statute formerly provided that after the death of the obligor in a contract bearing a higher rate of interest than the legal rate, and the maturity of the contract, the contract should draw only the legal rate in an action to enforce the vendor's lien. McClure v. Bigstaff, (Ky. 1896) 37 S. W. Rep. 294; Fenley v. Kendall, (Ky. 1892) 18 S. W. Rep. 637. But see Stat. Ky. (1894), § 2218 et seq.

Minnesota. — In Minnesota, under Laws 1860, c. 23, § 1, in order that the contract rate of interest before maturity should furnish the measure of damages after default, it was held that the parties should express in the contract their intention that the rate reserved before due should be the rate after due, or the measure of damages on a breach. Newell v. Houlton, 22 Minn. 19. And see Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416, 2 Am. Rep. 142.

Vermont — Rule as to Railroad Bonds. — It has been held that under the Vermont law, railroad bonds draw interest at the contract rate after maturity as well as before, and the interest coupons at the usual rate allowed by law from the time when due. Jackson, etc., Co. v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 29 Fed. Rep. 474, citing the unreported case of Cheever v. Rutland, etc., R. Co., Supm. Ct. Vt. 1869.

provided for by statute.¹ In some states a general and uniform rate is given on a judgment or decree, irrespective of any agreement of the parties as to rate, where the action is on a contract providing for interest.² In other states, however, the statute contains a provision that where a judgment is upon a contract itself providing for a particular rate of interest, the judgment or decree shall continue to bear such contract rate until paid.³

5. Statutes Changing Rate — a. IN GENERAL. — All of the cases agree that a change in the rate of interest by statute operates, as a general rule, only prospectively, and will not be permitted to affect rights already accrued.⁴

Friend*, 46 Kan. 24.

Michigan. — In Michigan it is provided that in judgments on written contracts the rate of interest shall be computed at the rate specified in the instrument, not exceeding ten per cent. per annum. Comp. Laws Mich. (1897), § 4865; Tousey v. Moore, 79 Mich. 564. But as to the maximum rate under the present statute see Comp. Laws Mich. (1897), § 4856.

Missouri. — In Missouri it is provided that judgments and orders for money on contracts bearing more than six per cent. interest shall bear the same interest as borne by such contracts. Rev. Stat. Mo. (1899) § 3707; Corley v. McKeag, 57 Mo. App. 415.

Nebraska. — The Nebraska statute provides in substance that all decrees and judgments for the payment of money shall draw interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date of the rendition thereof until paid, but if such judgment or decree is founded upon a contract, by the terms of which a greater rate of lawful interest shall have been agreed upon, then such judgment or decree shall draw the same rate of interest as the contract on which

In the case of Llano Imp. Co. v. Watkins, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 428, the note sued on provided for twelve per cent. interest and ten per cent. on principal and interest as attorney's fees, if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. The court gave judgment for the amount due on the note, principal and interest, and ten per cent. thereon as attorney's fees, the whole judgment to bear twelve per cent. interest from date. It was held under the statute not to be error to allow the contract rate of interest on the whole amount of the judgment. See also Llano Imp., etc., Co. v. Eubanks, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 108.

West Virginia. — Shipman v. Bailey, 20 W. Va. 140; Pickens v. McCoy, 24 W. Va. 344.

A Statute Providing that Judgments or Decrees upon contracts bearing more than six per cent. interest shall bear the same interest as may be specified in such contracts, authorizes a judgment for interest at the rate specified in the contract upon the whole sum adjudged or decreed, including both principal debt and damages—that is, interest accruing before the rendition of the judgment. *Henry v. Reduction of Rate on Redemption from Judicial Sales. — It has been held that a law reducing the rate of interest to be paid by parties on redeeming from a judicial sale does not apply and what may or may not be considered accrued rights in this respect, the authorities are not so harmonious.

b. INTEREST DUE BY CONTRACT — (1) In General. — There is no doubt that where parties to a contract have agreed upon a rate of interest, lawful when contracted for, the fact that the conventional rate is subsequently reduced by legislative enactment will not affect the binding force and validity of the undertaking.¹ To permit such a result would be to impair the obligation of the contract.

(2) Interest Contracted for, but No Rate Named. — Where, in a contract for the payment of money, there is a stipulation for interest, but no rate is specified, it has been held that the existing legal rate when the contract was executed becomes the contract rate, and as such is insusceptible of to redemptions made from sales before such act took effect. Bauer Grocer Co. v. Zelle, 172 Ill. 407.

Redemption from Mortgage. — But a statute reducing the rate of interest which redemptioners under a mortgage are required to pay does not impair the contract obligation of mortgages previously executed. Robertson v. Van Cleave, 129 Ind. 217.

A Statute Permitting a Renewal of Loans at Ten Per Cent. made when the law in force did not permit a higher rate than six per cent. is not unconstitutional, as being not equal and uniform in its operation, for partiality to the creditor class. Caruthers v. Andrews, 2 Coldw. (Tenn.) 378.

Interest on Debt Revived by New Promise. — It has been held that where a debt bearing the conventional rate of interest, lawful when the contract was made, was revived by a new promise after having been barred by the statute of limitations, it would continue to bear the conventional rate of interest although by a change in the law, made in the interval between the execution of the note and the revival of the obligation by the new promise, the conventional rate exceeded that allowed by the provisions of the later law. Vines v. Tift, 79 Ga. 301. But in an action on a promissory note the liability upon which had been revived by an oral promise to pay after a discharge in insolvency proceedings, it was held that only legal interest was recoverable, although the note by its terms bore a rate of interest higher than the legal rate. Lambert v. Schmalz, 118 Cal. 33.

Rule Applicable Whether Contract Express or Implied. — Where there is either an express or an implied contract to pay interest until the principal sum shall be paid, interest at the agreed rate, if lawful when contracted for, will be the rate recoverable until payment of the principal, notwithstanding subsequent legislation changing the conventional rate. Wyoming Nat. Bank v. Brown, 7 Wyo. 494. See also Wilcox v. Van Voorhis, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 577.

Interest After Maturity. — It is immaterial whether the interest sought to be recovered had accrued before or after the principal sum was due, provided the rate is recoverable by contract express or implied. Wilcox v. Van Voorhis, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 577; Taylor v. Wing, 84 N. Y. 471. See also Association, etc., v. Eagleson (N. Y. Super. Ct. Spec. T.) 60 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 9.

A Constitutional Provision reducing the rate of interest which may lawfully be contracted for does not affect contracts entered into before its adoption. Hagood v. Aikin, 57 Tex. 511; Cecil v. Hicks, 29 Gratt. (Va.) 1, 26 Am. Rep. 301.

Contract Controlled by Law in Existence When Contract Made. — Where, at the time of the execution of a promissory note bearing the highest contractual rate allowed by law, the statute prescribing the rate also provided that after the death of the payer and the maturity of the contract only legal interest should be recoverable, it was held that the statute in existence at the time of the execution of the contract would control, although it had been repealed before the death of the payer in the particular contract. Fenley v. Kendall, (Ky. 1892) 18 S. W. Rep. 637.

But in Another Case It Was Held that where a person contracted for the payment of a higher rate of interest than could at the time be lawfully contracted for, but the law in force at the time the remedy was sought against him allowed parties to contract for the payment of such higher rate, the latter law would control. Klingensmith v. Reed, 31 Ind. 389.

Where, by a Special Statute, legal interest is made payable on particular evidences of debt or specified obligations from a fixed time, the legal rate of interest existing at such date cannot be varied by subsequent legislation.²

(3) Contract for Money with No Stipulation for Interest. — Some cases have held that in a contract for the payment of money at a stated time, the legal rate of interest existing at the date of the contract becomes the contract rate, though no reference whatever to interest be made in the contract, and therefore a subsequent change of the legal rate will not affect the rate on such contract.³

(4) Contract for Legal Rate as Changed by Law. — There is, of course, no doubt that it is competent for parties to enter into contracts by which the rate of interest to be paid will change with the variations of the legal rate.⁴

c. INTEREST RECOVERABLE AS DAMAGES. — Where interest, if allowed, is recoverable only as a legally established measure of damages for default in an obligation to pay money or to compensate for injuries inflicted, the general rule is that in its computation the fluctuations of the legal rate must be considered.⁵

d. JUDGMENTS. — The general rule is that a judgment bears interest at the Note Due One Day After Date. — In Myrick v. Battle, 5 Fla. 345, where the legal rate of interest was reduced on the day after the execution of a note payable one day after date and containing no stipulation for interest, it was held that the owner of the note was entitled to recover interest at the rate existing on the day when the note was executed.

Annuity Created by Will. — The case of Thorn-ton v. Fitzhugh, 4 Leigh (Va.) 209, involved a bequest of an annuity by will while the legal rate of interest was only five per cent., and it was held that though the annuity fell in arrears after the legal rate of interest had been increased to six per cent., yet only five per cent. should be allowed on such arrears.

Death by Wrongful Act. — It has been held that the excepting clause of a statute reducing the legal rate of interest from seven to six per cent., declaring that nothing contained therein shall affect contracts or obligations made before the passage of the act, does not apply to the liability for a tort created by statute. Thus, where at the time of personal injuries to a decedent for which a recovery was sought the legal rate of interest was seven per cent., but subsequent thereto and before the verdict rendered in the action for the death the legal rate was changed to six per cent., it was held in an action under a statute providing for interest on the damages assessed from the date of the death that the interest recoverable was at the rate of six and not seven per cent. Salter v. Utica, etc., R. Co., 86 N. Y. 401, overruling Erwin v. Never-sink Steamboat Co., 23 Hun (N. Y.) 578.

legal rate existing at the time when the judgment was recovered, though the rate may have been different at the time when the cause of action accrued.¹

Doctrine that Interest on Judgments Not Subject to Change. — Some cases hold broadly that a judgment is a contract, and upon its rendition the rights of the parties become fixed with reference to the rate of interest borne by judgments under the law existing when the judgment is rendered, which is not, therefore, subject to subsequent legislative change.²

Rule that Interest on Judgments Follows Fluctuations of Law. — On the other hand, exactly the reverse has been held, and the computation of interest made to follow the fluctuations of the rate of interest recoverable on judgments during the entire period for which the interest is allowed.³

Where Judgment in Terms Bears Interest — Rule under Statute. — Still other decisions have only announced a rule which applies to cases where the judgment in terms bears interest,⁴ or where it is rendered on a contract bearing interest under a statute providing that a judgment under such circumstances shall continue to bear the rate of interest stipulated for in the contract.⁵

1. Interest on Judgments — Rate Existing at Rendition. — Salter v. Utica, etc., R. Co., 86 N. Y. 401; Gunn v. Miller, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. Rep. 278; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Gray, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 24 S. W. Rep. 921.

Change of Rate Between Interlocutory and Final Judgment. — Although at the time of the rendition of an interlocutory judgment by default in an action on an account the law allowed eight per cent. interest, yet if before the time of final judgment the legal rate has been reduced to six per cent., the judgment will bear interest at the latter rate from the date of its rendition. Alliance Milling Co. v. Eaton, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 33 S. W. Rep. 588.

Change of Rate Between Entry of Judgment and Affirmance on Appeal. — Where a statute provided that judgments affirmed in a higher court should be for the judgment of the lower court, and interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum, instead of twelve and one-half per cent. "as now allowed by law," it was held on a judgment rendered in an inferior court before the act took effect, but not affirmed by the appellate tribunal until several years thereafter, that interest at twelve and one-half per cent. would be considered correct. Rogers v. Stokes, 87 Tenn. 294.

Change of Rate Between Contract and Judgment. — Under a statute providing that when a contract upon which a judgment is founded bears a greater rate of interest than eight per cent., not exceeding the highest conventional rate allowed by law, a judgment rendered thereon shall bear the same rate, it has been held that the judgment would be entered at the rate borne by the contract if legal when the contract was made, though such rate would have been illegal if contracted for at the date of the entry of the judgment. Hagood v. Aikin, 57 Tex. 511.

2. Interest Rate Not Subject of Change. — Sharpe v. Morgan, 44 Ill. App. 346; Cox v. Marlatt, 36 N. J. L. 389, 13 Am. Rep. 454.

3. Fluctuations of Rate — New York. — O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64; Morley v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 146 U. S. 162, decided under the New York statute.

Texas. — Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Humphries, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 335; Ellis v. Barlow, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. Rep. 908. But see

Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Anderson, 149 U. S. 237, decided under the Texas statute.

Wyoming. — Wyoming Nat. Bank v. Brown, 7 Wyo. 494.

A Judgment Is Not a Contract so that the legal rate existing when the judgment was rendered must continue until paid or merged in another judgment, notwithstanding a subsequent reduction of the legal rate, as would be the case in a voluntary contract or obligation bearing interest by its terms and no time for payment of the principal named. Thus in an action on a judgment rendered during the existence of a statute giving to a creditor seven per cent. interest thereon, it was held that upon the subsequent reduction of the rate to six per cent. the judgment creditor was entitled only to recover seven per cent. up to the date of the change and six per cent. thereafter. O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64.

4. Judgment in Terms Bearing Interest — Doctrine that Rate Is Fixed. — It has been held that where a judgment specifies the rate of interest that it shall bear, being lawful at the time of its rendition, such rate will not change with the fluctuation of the interest laws. Burns v. Woolery, 15 Wash. 134. See also Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Patton, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 35 S. W. Rep. 477.

Doctrine that Rate Fluctuates. — It has been held, however, that the fact that a judgment in terms bears interest does not change the rule that the interest subsequently accruing thereon conforms to the fluctuations of the legal rate. O'Brien v. Young, 95 N. Y. 428, 47 Am. Rep. 64; Proudy v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 95 N. Y. 667.

5. Provision that Judgment Shall Carry Contract Rate — Doctrine that Rate Does Not Change. — Getto v. Friend, 46 Kan. 24; Corley v. McKeag, 57 Mo. App. 415; Bond v. Dolby, 17 Neb. 491.

Contrary Dictum. — For an intimation that although it is provided by statute that a judgment rendered on a contract bearing interest shall continue to bear the same rate of interest as borne by the contract, yet upon the subsequent enactment of a statute providing that interest on judgments shall be at a prescribed rate, the rate borne by pre-existing judgments

XII. SUSPENSION OF INTEREST — 1. By Terms of Contract. — Where, by construction of the terms of a contract for the payment of money, interest thereon is to be suspended in a certain contingency or until a specified time, the contract will control and interest will be recoverable only as therein provided.¹

2. By Act or Omission of Creditor — a. IN GENERAL. — Where delay in the payment of the principal debt is caused by some improper act or omission of the creditor, the general rule is that the accrual of interest will be regarded as suspended during such period.² Thus, if a creditor, by his own act, puts it out of the power of the debtor to make payment, as where the creditor, by absenting himself from the country, without leaving an agent or attorney to represent him, renders it impossible for the debtor to discharge the debt, no interest is recoverable during such period as the debtor was thus prevented from paying.³ But as it is the duty of the debtor to seek his creditor and changes in conformity therewith, see observations of Corn, J., in Wyoming Nat. Bank v. Brown, 7 Wyo. 494.

1. Interest Suspended by Terms of Contract. — Gale v. Corey, 112 Ind. 39.

Agreement Not to Sue. — Where a note was made payable one day after date, and an agreement was subjoined that suit should not be brought on it so long as the maker should remain solvent, such agreement, it was held, could not be regarded, either in point of intention or in legal effect, as impairing the right to interest as due by the terms of the note and contract of the parties. Rollman v. Baker, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 406.

Note Not Payable until Death of Maker. — A note payable one day after date, with an indorsement thereon that it was not to be paid until the death of the maker, bears interest from the time when it became due according to its tenor, without reference to the indorsement. Powell v. Guy, 3 Dev. & B. L. (20 N. Car.) 70.

Suspension of Interest Contrary to Terms of Contract. — In Hayes v. Elmsley, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 623, it was held that though a contract provided that "if from any cause whatever" the price was not paid at a specified time, interest should be paid from the date of the contract, the purchaser was, nevertheless, relieved from payment of interest where the delay was caused by the wilful default of the vendor.

pay his debt, he must show that the failure to pay was not the result of his own neglect.¹

b. FAILURE TO PRESENT BILL OR NOTE FOR PAYMENT. — Where a bill of exchange, bond for the payment of money, or promissory note designates a place of payment, interest will not, in general, be allowed from the maturity of the instrument, unless presentment is made accordingly.² But an instrument not designating a place of payment need not be presented when due, in order to bind the obligor for interest after maturity.³

What Defendant Must Show. — According to some cases the rule is that the defendant, in order to relieve himself from interest, must show affirmatively that he had the money at the place of payment on the day when it was due, and that he kept it there or subsequently paid it into court.⁴

c. LACHES. — It has been said that interest is never allowed where the delay is the result of the failure of the creditor to press the collection of his claim,⁵ which seems to have been the ground upon which interest was originally denied in actions for money had and received.⁶

Delay Pending Decision of Test Case. — The delay of a party to enforce a claim while waiting for a decision upon a test case growing out of the same trans-

Contrary Doctrine. — In Westcott v. Patton, 10 Colo. App. 544, it was observed, citing Tisdeman on Commercial Paper, § 370, that the failure to present for payment notes made payable at a designated place at their maturity would not stop the accrual of interest, nothing but a proper tender of payment having such effect. The authority cited does not state this, however, but on the contrary says that "there can be no recovery of interest if the paper is payable at a specified place and the holder did not present it there for payment."

5. Delay in Collecting Claim. — Du Belloix v. Waterpark, 1 D. & R. 16, 16 E. C. L. 12; Redfield v. Ystalyfera Iron Co., 110 U. S. 174; Erskine v. Van Arsdale, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 75; Adams Express Co. v. Milton, 11 Bush (Ky.) 49; Morford v. Ambrose, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 688; Newel v. Keith, 11 Vt. 214. See generally the title LACHES.

The rule stated in the text is especially true where it does not appear that the defendant has earned interest on the money withheld by him. U. S. v. Sanborn, 135 U. S. 271.

Delay Between Institution of Action and Trial.

— Where an action was not brought to trial until twenty-three years after its institution, it was held that interest might be denied to the plaintiff if it appeared that the delay between the institution of the suit and the trial was due to his fault or dereliction. Where, however, though an unreasonably long time has elapsed between the institution of the action and its prosecution, the jury finds that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches for a portion of such period only, interest will be denied only for the time during which there has been laches. Stewart v. Schell, 31 Fed. Rep. 65.

6. Money Had and Received. — Depcke v. Munn, 3 C. & P. 112, 14 E. C. L. 231.

action on which the plaintiff bases his right is not such a delay as will warrant a jury in denying interest.¹

If There Is No Person of Whom Payment May Be Demanded, the creditor is not chargeable with laches in not making a demand.²

Delay at Debtor's Request. — Where the delay is at the request and for the benefit of the debtor, such laches as will bar a recovery of interest will not be imputed.³

d. NEGLIGENCE TO ASCERTAIN AMOUNT DUE. — Where it is the creditor's duty to ascertain the amount due to him by his debtor, interest will not be allowed to him in advance of such ascertainment.⁴ The mere failure of the creditor, however, to come to an amicable settlement of accounts with his debtor, thereby necessitating a proceeding in court for the purpose, will not warrant the denial of interest, unless the creditor's conduct is so arbitrary and capricious as to merit punishment in this manner.⁵

e. VENDOR'S DELAY TO MAKE TITLE. — A mere delay by a vendor of property to make a valid title thereto does not suspend the running of interest as to a vendee in possession,⁶ unless the former's default was wilful, or the vendee has kept the purchase money idle and unemployed in order to pay it over when required.⁷

f. DEATH OF CREDITOR. — It has been held that the death of the creditor will not suspend the running of interest although a considerable period elapses before the appointment of a personal representative.⁸

g. TENDER — (1) Generally. — If the obligor in a contract for the payment

1. Delay Pending Decision of Test Case. — Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 126. But see Redfield v. Bartels, 139 U. S. 694.

2. Death of Debtor and Delay in Appointment of Representative. — Where the acceptor of a bill of exchange died intestate before it became due, it was held, in a suit to administer the personal estate of the intestate, that interest was payable from the date at which the bill became due, although administration had not been taken out for more than thirty-five years from the maturity of the bill. Maxwell v. Tuohill, 1 L. R. (1r.) 250.

3. Delay at Debtor's Request. — Funk v. Buck, 91 Ill. 575.

4. Neglect of Creditor to Ascertain Amount Due. — London, etc., R. Co. v. South Eastern R. Co., (1892) 1 Ch. 120, 61 L. J. Ch. 294, 65 L. T. N. S. 722, 40 W. Inadvertent Omission of Item in Account. — Where the plaintiff supplied the defendants with wood, for which they were in the habit of settling from time to time, but omitted at one of these settlements to present his claim for a certain quantity of wood, and the omission was not discovered until a long time after, it was held that he could not recover interest on such item. Brainerd v. Champlain Transp. Co., 29 Vt. 154.

5. Mere Failure to Come to Amicable Adjustment. — Crawford v. Osmun, 90 Mich. 77.

And though the Plaintiff Seeks to Recover More than Is Justly Due on a contract for the payment of money, yet interest on the amount properly due is not thereby suspended, in the absence of a tender by the defendant of the sum actually due and owing. Anderson v. Smith, 108 Mich. 60.

Failure to Render Account of Amount Due on Promissory Note. — The fact that the payee in a promissory note does not render an account of the amount due thereon will not discharge the maker of the note from liability for the stipulated interest, in the absence of any tender, and particularly where it is shown that the maker never had on hand a sufficient amount to pay the sum due. Lamprey v. Mason, 148 Mass. 231.

6. Vendor's Delay to Make Title. — Bates v. Wynn, (Pa. 1887) 11 Atl. Rep. 448; Selden v. James, 6 Rand. (Va.) 465; Stevenson v. Davis, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 629. See also the titles Covenants, vol. 8, p. 43; VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Purchase Money Kept Idle by Vendee. — Selden v. James, 6 Rand. (Va.) 465; Bates v. Wynn, (Pa. 1887) 11 Atl. Rep. 448.

Setting Off Costs Against Interest. — The vendee's costs in defending the suit cannot be set off against the interest, as the trouble and expense of defending a suit are things to which every one is exposed. Selden v. James, 6 Rand. (Va.) 465.

8. Death of Creditor. — Gale v. Corey, 112 Ind. 39; Watts v. Garcia, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 656; Stevenson v. Hodder, 15 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 570.

Where a creditor with whom a policy of insurance on the debtor's life was deposited as security demanded payment after the latter's death intestate, in the absence of administration on his estate, it was held that interest was not recoverable from the date of demand, because the company was justified in refusing payment in the absence of the consent of the insured debtor's personal representative, the delay in such a case being due to the creditor's neglect to clothe himself with the legal title to the money. Webster v. British Empire Mut. L. Assur. Co., 15 Ch. D. 169.

of money makes tender of the amount due at maturity, this will, in general, be held to relieve him from liability for interest thereafter.¹

Tender Considered as Payment. — A tender, it has been said, so far as the computation of interest is concerned, must be considered as a payment.²

(2) What Is Sufficient Tender — (a) Mere Readiness to Pay. — Mere readiness to pay a debt will not excuse the payment of interest.³

(b) Tender of Less Sum than Due. — If tender be made of a less sum than is justly due, a refusal to receive it is no bar to the subsequent recovery of interest on the entire debt.⁴

(c) Offer to Pay on Condition. — An offer of payment on a reasonable condition, as that the creditor execute a deed according to contract for property purchased,⁵ or deliver up a promissory note,⁶ is sufficient to prevent the subsequent accrual of interest.

2. Tender Considered as Payment. — Hidden v. Jordan, 39 Cal. 61.

Keeping Tender Good. — It was held, however, in Nelson v. Loder, 132 N. Y. 288, that "if a debtor wishes to extinguish his liability for subsequently accruing interest, or demands some affirmative relief, he cannot retain the money subject to his own use, but must devote it to the specific purpose of paying the debt, and put it within the power of the creditor to receive it at any time. He must keep his tender good." Citing Gyles v. Hall, 2 P. Wms. 378; Bishop v. Church, 2 Ves. 371; Garforth v. Bradley, 2 Ves. 675; Stow v. Russell, 36 Ill. 18; Tuthill v. Morris, 81 N. Y. 94; Harris v. Jex, 55 N. Y. 421, 14 Am. Rep. 285.

Use of Money by Debtor Subsequent to Tender Refused. — In several cases it has been inti-imated that if it can be shown that the debtor, after tender made and rejected, employed the funds at a profit, he should not be excused from interest. Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen (Mass.) 94. See also, as containing a similar intimation, Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 83.

3. Mere Readiness to Pay Held Not Sufficient. — De Wolfe v. Taylor, 71 Iowa 650; Hummel v. Brown, 24 Pa. St. 310; Lusk v. Smith, 21 Wis. 27.

Rule under Statute — "Diligent Inquiry" Not Equivalent to Tender. — Under a statute providing that a negotiable instrument which does not specify a place of payment is payable at the residence or place of business of the maker or wherever he may be found, a person liable on a note cannot avoid liability for interest after maturity merely by making diligent inquiry and efforts to ascertain the whereabouts of the payee and the note. In order to avoid liability for subsequent interest the maker must, at the maturity of the note, make tender at the place of business or residence of the maker. McCauley v. Leavitt, 10 Utah 91.

An Offer by a Third Person, desirous of purchasing property upon which there is a judgment lien, that he will pay off the judgment if he can get a good title to the property, is not such a tender as to stop the interest upon the judgment. Jones v. Moore, 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 632.

Tender on Unreasonable Condition. — Where the purchaser of an equity of redemption tendered the mortgage money on a condition which he had no right to impose, he cannot, on its being refused, insist on an abatement of the interest. Rives v. Dudley, 3 Jones Eq. (56 N. Car.) 126.

6. Requiring Surrender of Note. — Dent v. Dunn, 3 Campb. 296.

(3) Doctrine that Technical Tender Unnecessary. — It is held that when interest, if given, is by way of damages for nonpayment, a technical tender is not necessary to warrant its denial, but that the effect of a tender should be given to any circumstances which would make it appear inequitable to require the defendant to pay damages to the plaintiff for the detention of the debt.¹

3. By Act of Law — a. IN GENERAL. — Interest being allowed on the ground that the debtor is in default and has used the creditor's money, it is never given where payment of the debt has been prevented by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction or by the interposition of the law.²

Delay in Course of Legal Proceedings. — Where the delay in the payment of the debt is due merely to delay in the course of legal proceedings, interest will not generally be required.³

b. INJUNCTION OR ORDER OF COURT. — Where a party is restrained by injunction from using funds in his hands, he will not be chargeable with interest while so restrained.⁴

Injunction Against Paying Over Money. — Where persons are merely enjoined from paying over money due and in their possession, for which they contracted to pay interest, it has been held that the money must be paid into court in order that no interest shall be recoverable;⁵ but other cases have decided that no interest will be allowed during the pendency of an injunction⁶ although the party enjoined actually used and made a profit on the funds.⁷

Where Debtor Restrains Creditor from Collection of Debt. — As a general rule, however, a debtor who restrains his creditor from collection of the debt will be liable for interest on dissolution of the injunction.⁸

Rule by Statute. — In California it is provided by statute that interest is not recoverable during such time as the debtor is prevented by law from paying the debt. Civ. Code Cal., § 3287; Martin v. Ede, 103 Cal. 157.

An act of assembly authorizing the auditor of the state to issue warrants in favor of a creditor of the commonwealth on any particular fund will not stop the interest accruing on the debt, unless it appears that the fund was sufficient at the time for its payment. Com. v. Newton, 1 Hen. & M. (Va.) 90.

3. Delay in Course of Legal Proceedings. — Hawley v. Barker, 5 Colo. 118; Donahue v. Partridge, 160 Mass. 336; Kelsey v. Murphy, 30 Pa. St. 340.

A district attorney is not entitled to interest on his accounts for the time between their allowance by the treasury department and their payment. Baxter v. U. S., 51 Fed. Rep. 671, 10 U. S. App. 243.

Delay Pending Collateral Litigation. — The vendee of land to whom a deed is made and possession given is not excused from paying interest on the deferred instalments of purchase money by reason of the fact that he delayed paying it on account of litigation over an adverse claim set up by a third party, the vendee having continued in possession and enjoyed the issues and profits. Selden v. James, 6 Rand. (Va.) 465.

4. Enjoining Debtor from Using Money. — Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738; Warren v. Banning, 140 N. Y. 227.

5. Enjoining Debtor from Paying Over Money. — Curd v. Letcher, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 443.

6. Injunction at Instance of Creditor. — Le Branthwait v. Halsey, 9 N. J. L. 3; Stevens v. Barringer, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 639.

7. Where Party Makes Profit on Funds. — Although there was evidence that the defendant actually used and employed the funds during the pendency of the injunction restraining him from paying them over, it has been held that no interest was recoverable. Stevens v. Barringer, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 639. In this case the court said: "There would be no hardship in this case in requiring the defendants to pay interest; but the principle is not to be controverted that a person who is prohibited by an injunction from paying the principal shall not be compelled to pay interest."

8. Restraining Collection of Debt. — Hosack v.

Payment Prevented by Order of Court Pending Litigation. — Interest is not, as a rule, allowed where payment has been prevented or suspended by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction to await the settlement of controversy among several claimants.¹

c. MONEY PAID INTO COURT. — If a fund has been paid into court, and cannot be paid out without an order of the court, it does not ordinarily bear interest.²

4. By Existence of State of War — a. IN GENERAL. — If the debtor is a citizen and resident of one country and the creditor a citizen and resident of another, the general rule has been said to be that the accrual of interest will be suspended during such time as a state of war exists between the respective countries.³

Rogers, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 461; Shipman v. Fletcher, 95 Va. 585.

In an Action on an Injunction Bond given upon the granting of an injunction to restrain the payment of a certain sum of money to the obligees, interest on such sum is recoverable as a matter of right up to the time when the money was paid into court on dissolution of the injunction. Wallis v. Dilley, 7 Md. 237.

But Where a Judgment Creditor Had Been Enjoined and ordered to account for and pay over to the defendant money received by virtue of sales made by the sheriff under execution, it was held that he was liable for interest as a matter of course. Smith v. Godbold, 4 Strobb. Eq. (S. Car.) 186.

1. Payment Restrained Pending Litigation. — Bowman v. Wilson, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 394.

A Creditor of an Insolvent Estate who has an unqualified right to a specific fund is, however, entitled to interest accruing on his claim pending litigation concerning it between himself and the debtor's personal representative. In re Robb, 5 Ohio N. P. 52, 5 Ohio Dec. 227.

And the interest on a claim is not suspended by the debtor placing it upon his schedule, where the creditor takes no part in the proceeding, although the debtor may obtain a respite. Finley v. Mallard, 12 La. Ann. 833.

Delay in Payment of Dividend. — Where the creditor of an insolvent is delayed in the receipt of a dividend on his debt to which he is entitled, the delay being due to an order of court pending litigation as to the amount of indebtedness on which the dividend is to be computed, the creditor is entitled to interest on such dividend, though it happens that the funds of the insolvent are deposited with the creditor, a bank, such deposit being made in the usual course of business. People v. Remington, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 307.

But where the funds of an insolvent claimed by several creditors, one of them a bank, were, by an order of the court, made by the consent of the parties, deposited in the bank, it agreeing to pay them over on the court's order, if it was finally decided to be not entitled to them, and meantime the bank used the funds as its own, upon a subsequent order upon the bank to pay over the funds it was held liable for interest thereon for the time during which it retained and used them. Kenton Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 93 Ky. 129.

Appointment of Receiver. — Where a person has contracted to pay a stipulated rate of interest higher than the legal rate in the absence of contract, on the balance of purchase money on property, the fact that after a default the debtor is deprived of his property by the appointment of a receiver, at the instance of the creditor, is no defense to the claim for interest at the contract rate. Strayer v. Long, 83 Va. 715.

2. Money Paid into Court. — Bowman v. Wilson, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 394; Potter v. Gardner, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 718; Lilley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 92 Mich. 153.

Adverse Claimants of Insurance Money — Payment into Court by Insurer. — An insurance company, joined as defendant in a suit between adverse claimants of the insurance company, which is willing to pay to the proper person when designated by the court, should be permitted to pay into court the amount due under the policy to abide the result of a contest therefor, and by so doing will not be liable for interest thereon pending trial. Lilley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 92 Mich. 153.

Where, on the motion of interveners, acting in good faith, it was ordered that money for which the plaintiff was suing be paid to the clerk to await the further order of the court, and the money was there detained by an erroneous order of the court, whereby the cause was continued, it was held that the interveners were not liable for interest during the time of such detention simply because they failed to establish their right to the money. Van Gordon v. Ormsby, 60 Iowa 510.

Bill of Interpleader. — Interest is not stopped by a bill of interpleader improperly filed. Pfister v. Wade, 69 Cal. 133; Michigan, etc., Plaster Co. v. White, 44 Mich. 25.

Minnesota. — Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416, 2 Am. Rep. 142.

b. ONLY INTEREST AS DAMAGES SUSPENDED — (1) In General. — The existence of a state of war between the respective countries of the debtor and creditor suspends the accrual of interest only where it would ordinarily be recoverable as damages, and not as a substantive part of the debt.¹ So limited, the reason of the rule is obvious — that a party should not be called upon to pay damages for retaining money where it was his duty to withhold it and not to pay it over.²

(2) Subsequent Contract to Pay. — Where, however, interest during the pendency of war was included in an account rendered after the termination of hostilities, which by acquiescence became an account stated, it was held that such interest was recoverable in an action thereon, though it might not have been recoverable had objection to it been made in proper season.³

c. REQUISITES TO APPLICATION OF RULE. — It is essential to the application of the rule suspending interest where the respective countries of the debtor and creditor are engaged in war, that the circumstances be actually such that the payment of the debt was made impracticable, if not impossible.⁴ Thus interest is not suspended in cases where the creditor, although a subject of the enemy, remains in the country of the debtor, or has a known agent there authorized to receive the debt.⁵ The same is true where one of several

And see the title ALIENS, vol. 2, p. 64; WAR.

War Between the States. — This rule has also been held applicable to debts between citizens of the Confederate states and citizens of the states adhering to the federal government in the late civil war. Brown v. Hiatts, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 177. And see Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 447. Thus it was decided that during the continuance of hostilities between the Confederate states and the United States, interest did not run in favor of a citizen of Pennsylvania against a citizen of Georgia, resident in their respective states. Mayer v. Reed, 37 Ga. 482. But compare Shortridge v. Macon, Chase (U. S.) 136, holding the rule applicable to a mere rebellion against an existing government, and characterizing the civil war as such.

Where a Trustee Was Held Liable for a loss resulting through his investment of good money in Confederate bonds, interest was not allowed during the period of the civil war. Kirby v. Goodvkoontz, 26 Gratt. (Va.) 298.

Citizens and Residents of Same Country. — As a matter of course, the mere existence of a state of war will not suspend the running of interest upon debts between citizens of the same belligerent. Williams v. State, 37 Ark. 463. But in a number of states the statutes of limitations were expressly suspended during the civil war.

Statute Prohibiting Recovery of Interest to Persons Engaged in Rebellion. — The West Virginia Act of Feb. 15, 1868, prohibiting persons engaged in rebellion from recovering interest accruing during the rebellion, was, however, held not invalid as impairing vested rights. Hutchinson v. Landcraft, 4 W. Va. 312.

1. Only Interest as Damages Suspended. — Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416, 2 Am. Rep. 142. Compare Brown v. Hiatts, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 177.

Statute Abating Interest Accruing During War.

— It has been held that a state statute allowing an abatement of interest which accrued during the civil war does not contravene the clause of the Federal Constitution which forbids the states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, interest not being a subject of common-law right, but one of legislative permission and within the discretion of the jury to allow it or disallow it. Harmanson v. Wilson, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 207. In this case the court said that upon authority as presented in the Virginia cases of McCall v. Turner, 1 Call (Va.) 133; Brewer v. Hastie, 3 Call (Va.) 22; Cary v. Macon, 4 Call (Va.) 605, and Tucker v. Watson, (Va.) 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 220, and the series of Acts of Assembly by which this state has expressly and continuously, from the beginning, reserved to her juries a discretionary power over the subject of interest on money, it might assume the law of this commonwealth, as between citizens thereof, to be that interest during a period of war may be disallowed by a jury or a court without breach of contract.

2. Reason of Rule. — Brown v. Hiatts, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 177; Conn v. Penn, Pet. (C. C.) 496; Bean v. Chapman, 62 Ala. 58; Hoare v. Allen, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 102.

4. Payment Impracticable Because of War. — Shortridge v. Macon, Chase (U. S.) 136; Yeaton v. Berney, 62 Ill. 61.

Assignment and Reacquisition of Note. — Where the holder of a note assigned it before the civil war began, to a bank whose situs was in the town of the maker's residence, in a state which did not secede, and the note was protested for nonpayment at maturity and held by the bank during the pendency of the war, the payee, on reacquiring the note after the termination of hostilities, was held to be entitled to recover interest during the entire period. Thomas v. Hunter, 29 Md. 406. And see also cases cited in succeeding notes.

joint debtors resides in the same country with the creditor or with the known agent of the creditor, in an action against the former,¹ and also where the action is against the surety of a principal who is an alien enemy,² the defense permitting an abatement of interest being a personal one to the principal, and not available to the surety unless similarly situated.³

XIII. ANNUAL AND PERIODIC INTEREST — 1. Generally. — As has been seen, where interest is contracted for and accrues prior to the maturity of the principal, it will, in the absence of a contrary stipulation, be deemed payable only at the maturity of the principal debt, and not before.⁴

2. Periodic Interest Due Only by Contract — a. GENERAL RULE. — Interest is payable annually or at periodic intervals, of course, when it is made so by the contract of the parties.⁵

b. AFTER MATURITY OF PRINCIPAL DEBT. — In the absence of all contract, express or implied, for interest beyond the maturity of the principal debt, annual interest thereafter is not recoverable, though there may be a provision therefor in the contract, before the principal falls due.⁶

3. How Contracted For — Terms of Contract. — A stipulation for interest at a specified rate per annum does not import a contract to pay interest annually, the term employed only affording a measure for the computation of interest.⁷

Kentucky. — Haggard v. Conkwright, 7 Bush (Ky.) 16, 3 Am. Rep. 297.

Minnesota. — Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416, 2 Am. Rep. 142.

Tennessee. — Gates v. Union Bank, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 325.

Virginia. — Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt. (Va.) 207.

This Is for the Reason that payment to such creditor or his agent could in no respect be construed as a violation of the duties imposed by a state of war upon the debtor. The payment in such cases is not made to an enemy, and it is no objection that the agent may possibly remit the money to his principal; if he should do so, the offense is imputable to him, and not to the person paying the money to him. Conn v. Penn, Pet. (C. C.) 524.

Debtor's Knowledge of Proximity of Creditor or Agent. — In order, however, for the fact that the creditor or an agent is resident in the debtor's country to have the effect of taking the case out of the rule suspending interest between alien enemies during the pendency of war, the fact of the creditor's residence or that of his agent must be known to the debtor. Denniston v. Imbrie, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 396.

1. Creditor or Agent in Country of Joint Debtor. — Yeaton v. Berney, 62 Ill. 61; Paul v. Christie, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 161.

Where a Trustee and Debtors of the Trust Estate both resided in Confederate territory during the civil war, the trustee was held liable for interest on the fund during the war, although the cestui que trust resided outside of Confederate territory, as in such case the debtors to the trustee were bound to pay interest to him, and a trustee cannot derive a profit from the trust fund without rendering any equivalent therefor. Coltrane v. Worrell, 30 Gratt. (Va.) 434.

2. Resident Surety of Alien Enemy Principal. — Bean v. Chapman, 62 Ala. 58; Paul v. Christie, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 161.

6. Periodic Interest After Maturity of Debt. — In re Bartenbach, 11 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 61; Ashuelot R. Co. v. Elliot, 57 N. H. 397; Hunter v. Hall, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 425, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 366; Wheaton v. Pike, 9 R. I. 132, 98 Am. Dec. 377; Westfield v. Westfield, 19 S. Car. 85; Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. Car. 160; Sharp v. Lee, 14 S. Car. 343.

The Words "With Interest, Payable Annually," in the condition of a bond for the payment of money, do not extend to the allowance of interest on that interest which accrues after the bond becomes due, but only to that which annually accrues within the time limited for the payment of the bond. De Bruhl v. Neuffer, 1 Strobh. L. (S. Car.) 426. Likewise, in Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. Car. 160, a bond dated January 24, 1861, "payable in three years, in equal annual instalments, with lawful interest thereon from January 21, 1861, payable annually, and the first instalment, with interest on the whole principal sum due, payable on January 21, 1862," was held to draw annual interest only until maturity, and simple interest thereafter.

Where It Is Expressly Provided by the Contract that the interest shall be paid annually after as well as before the maturity of the principal, effect will, of course, be given to such provision. Thus, a bond payable "in three equal annual instalments from this date, with interest payable annually until the whole be paid," draws annual interest beyond the several instalments, and such annual interest continues after maturity as well as before. Watkins v. Lang, 17 S. Car. 13. See also Miller v. Hall, 18 S. Car. 141.

7. Contract for Interest at Specified Rate per Annum. — Ramsdell v. Hulett, 50 Kan. 440;

Volume XVI.

It has been held, indeed, that a provision in a note, "if interest be not paid annually to become as principal, and bear the same rate of interest," is not a promise to pay annually.¹ But where a note is payable "with annual interest" the interest is payable each year.² A contract for "annual interest" is the same as a stipulation for "interest annually."³

4. Action for Interest When Due. — Though it may formerly have been questioned,⁴ there is now no doubt that there may be a suit for an interest installment if not paid when due, or successive suits for successive defaults, as for a debt separate and distinct from the principal sum.⁵ And the holder of a promissory note which stipulates for the payment of interest semiannually may, upon action brought between the semiannual periods at which the interest is payable, recover full interest up to judgment.⁶

Action for Annual Interest Before Maturity of Principal. — Such actions may be instituted before the maturity of the principal debt.⁷

Action Brought After Maturity of Principal — Merger. — It has been held that Motsinger v. Miller, 59 Kan. 575; Koehring v. Muemminghoff, 61 Mo. 406, 21 Am. Rep. 402; Cooper v. Wright, 23 N. J. L. 200; Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44.

Where Principal Payable in Annual Instalments. — A promissory note for the payment of one thousand dollars in ten annual instalments, with interest, only requires the payment of interest on the several instalments as they respectively become due, and not annually on the whole principal sum remaining unpaid. Bander v. Bander, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 560. See also Stumps v. Cooper, 3 Baxt. (Tenn.) 223.

Where a note provided that interest should be paid annually, it was held that the interest instalments fell due on the successive anniversaries of the date of the note, and not on the date fixed for the payment of annual instalments of the principal debt. Jurgensen v. Carlsen, 97 Iowa 627.

3. Contract for "Annual Interest." — Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44. See also Austin v. Imus, 23 Vt. 286.

4. Early Doubt Subsequently Dispelled — True Intent of Parties. — In Sparhawk v. Wills, 6 Gray (Mass.) 163, the court said that formerly it was doubted whether several suits could be brought on a note payable by instalments, because, though there were different payments to be made at different times, there was but one contract; but it was held that such a contract imported, in legal effect, distinct promises, though expressed in one form of words. So on a note payable at the lapse of a term of years, with interest annually, interest alone may be sued for, when due. So on a note on demand, with interest annually. The law has thus been approximating to the construction which best gives effect to the true intent of contracting parties.

Assignment of Principal Reserving Interest. — Where a note payable a certain number of years after date contains a stipulation for the payment of interest annually, the contract to pay interest being severable, the payee may assign the principal and reserve the interest, with the right of collecting it by suit. Scott v. Liddell, 98 Ga. 24.

Southern Mut. L. Ins. Co.*, 12 Bush (Ky.) 434; Connors v. Holland, 113 Mass. 50.

Interest to Be Compounded. — Where the interest on a promissory note became due annually, although the action for interest is instituted after the principal sum is due, a recovery thereon is no merger of the liability on the principal indebtedness.¹

5. Interest on Annual or Periodic Interest. — It has been held that the recovery of compound interest is not necessarily warranted by the fact that a contract for the payment of money stipulates for interest payable annually.²

XIV. COMPOUND INTEREST AND INTEREST ON INTEREST — 1. General Rule Against. — In the light of the ancient prejudice against all interest, even for the use, forbearance, or detention of the principal debt, it is not to be wondered at that there was a still stronger aversion to interest on interest. And while at the present time this primitive and erroneous notion has been largely outgrown, so far as simple interest is concerned, except indeed to the extent to which the rate is limited by the statutes against usury, it may yet be stated as a general rule that the law does not favor compound interest or interest on interest.³ it was held that the fact that it was to be compounded with the principal, if not paid, did not have the effect of postponing its payment until the maturity of the whole note, nor did the plaintiff, by such stipulation, waive his right to sue for and recover the annual installments of interest as they matured. Rowe v. Schertz, 74 Mo. App. 602. And see Carter v. Carter, 76 Iowa 474; Castilio v. Martin, 11 Mo. App. 251; Stoner v. Evans, 38 Mo. 461; Waples v. Jones, 62 Mo. 440.

Doctrine at Common Law and under Early English Statutes. — In Wilson v. Davis, 1 Mont. 183, the court said that interest upon interest was not allowed at common law, although stipulated for by special contract. It was considered a violation of the laws of God and contrary to good conscience; and although an English statute was enacted leaving it to parties to agree to any interest less than a certain per cent., this statute was never construed by the English courts as allowing compound interest in any amount.

In Waring v. Cunliffe, 1 Ves. Jr. 99, Lord Thurlow said: "My opinion is in favor of interest upon interest, because I do not see any reason, if a man does not pay interest when he ought, why he should not pay interest for that also. But I have found the court in a constant habit of thinking the contrary, and I must overturn all the proceedings of the court if I give it." And see Chambers v. Goldwin, 9 Ves. Jr. 271.

Mortgagors of Property, After the Execution of Several Successive Mortgages Thereon, cannot agree to compute the interest so as to make it a charge on the mortgaged premises to the prejudice of junior mortgagees whose mortgages were in existence at the time when the agreement to compound the interest was made. Fitzhugh v. McPherson, 9 Gill & J. (Md.) 56.

But a deed of trust on real estate executed as security for a bond providing for the payment of interest annually will, it has been held, as between the parties thereto, stand security for the payment of interest notes executed by the debtor for several consecutive years, when the interest became due, as well as for interest on the interest notes. The claim for this interest upon interest will be subordinate, however, to the claims of subsequent creditors or purchasers. Barbour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410. See also Parkhurst v. Cummings, 56 Me. 155; Bradley v. Merrill, 91 Me. 340; Kittredge v. McLaughlin, 38 Me. 513; Stone v. Locke, 46 Me. 445.

Deduction of Interest in Advance. — Under a statute which allows interest only on the amount of money actually lent, interest on a loan cannot be deducted in advance. Timberlake v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Fed. Rep. 231.

Doctrine of De Minimis. — Where the judgment was for over fifty thousand dollars, it was held that the fact that the jury compounded the interest on nine dollars and sixty-

Explanatory. — For the purpose of anything approaching a clear comprehension of this very difficult subject, it will be necessary to observe at the outset a distinction, rarely made plain by the cases, between interest compounded periodically and simple interest on deferred instalments of interest after payment should have been made. All interest on interest is frequently designated compound interest, but interest compounded annually or periodically involves a different method of computation and a different result from mere simple interest on annual or periodic interest. By the former method, interest on interest, and so on ad infinitum, will bear interest, while in the latter case it is only the interest on the original principal sum upon which interest is given.

2. Allowance in Special Cases — a. GENERALLY. — In the announcement of the rule against compound interest it is not uncommon to reserve a rather broad exception in favor of the allowance of such interest in "special cases" or "particular circumstances."¹

b. COUPONS. — It is generally held that interest coupons, if not paid when two cents for a limited period would not, even if erroneous, vitiate the judgment, by virtue of the principle de minimis non curat lex. People's Sav. Bank v. Norwalk, 56 Conn. 547.

Doctrine that Compound Interest Savors of or Tends to Usury. — Interest on interest, while not usury, has been said "to savor of it, and obviously tends to the encouragement of avarice." Force v. Elizabeth, 28 N. J. Eq. 403. See also, as expressing a similar view, the following cases:

Stated Resume of Rules as to Compound Interest. — In Wilcox v. Howland, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 167, the court said: "The result of the doctrines upon this subject seems to be that a contract to pay compound interest is not usurious or void; that an agreement to pay interest annually or semiannually is valid and may be enforced by action; that a claim for interest on such interest is an equitable claim; but that on an action brought interest will not be allowed on interest from the time it fell due, because it would savor of usury, and because the holder of the note, by forbearing to call for his interest when it became due, shall be deemed to have waived his right to have the interest converted into capital."

Commissioner in Equity. — Where, upon a bill against a commissioner in equity for an account of certain securities ordered by the court to be taken by him, the defendant had reported that he had complied with the court's order in this respect, but gave no further account of the securities, it was held that he must be presumed to have received the money due according to their terms; and the interest thereon being payable annually, he was held to be properly charged with interest on interest. Heriot v. McCauley, Riley Eq. (S. Car.) 19.

due, will draw interest like other instruments for the payment of money,¹ though other authorities deny this on the ground that it would violate the rule against compound interest.²

c. JUDGMENTS AND DECREES — (1) General Rule. — Notwithstanding the disfavor with which the law is generally regarded as viewing compound interest, in almost every jurisdiction in which a money judgment or decree bears interest, the interest is compounded when such judgment or decree is rendered on an interest-bearing claim. That is, the judgment or decree is rendered for principal and accrued interest, and the aggregate, in the form of a judgment or decree, bears interest thereafter.³

Wrongful Refusal to Account. — Compound interest may properly be allowed in a decree for an accounting by way of damages for persistently and wrongfully refusing to account. Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457.

Compound interest should be given against an accounting party only when he has employed the money in his business. Mixing the money with the ordinary bank account of a firm of solicitors is not such employment in business as will render a member of the firm liable to compound interest. Burdick v. Garrick, L. R. 5 Ch. 233, 39 L. J. Ch. 369.

Recovery Back of Compound Interest After Payment. — If interest be actually paid on interest by reason of an agreement made at the time of the original contract, that this should be done, such interest cannot be recovered back, though its payment could not be enforced in the absence of a subsequent agreement made after the interest provided for by the original contract became due. Mowry v. Bishop, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 98; Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162, 23 Am. Rep. 99; Church v. Kidd, 3 Hun (N. Y.) 254. See also the title PAYMENT.

Payment under Protest. — But where it is held that a creditor cannot recover interest on interest becoming due after the maturity of the principal, compound interest required by a mortgagee and paid under protest by one claiming under the mortgagor, in order to prevent the expiration of the right of redemption, the mortgage having been foreclosed, may be recovered by the person who paid it under such circumstances. *Whitcomb v. Interest on Claims Referred to Commissioner. — It has been held that a claim referred to a commissioner appointed on a creditor's bill bearing interest from date at ten per cent. per annum until paid is properly audited and the interest at the contractual rate calculated thereupon as of the date of the auditing of the claim, the amount so computed, principal and interest, bearing interest thence at the contract rate until paid. Barbour v. Tompkins, 31 W. Va. 410. And see Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 13, 7 Am. Dec. 471.

But where a commissioner's report showed a balance owing from the defendant consisting entirely of interest found due on an account never before settled, and stated that that balance of interest was to bear interest from a remote day, to which report there was no exception, the court decreeing the balance with interest accordingly, it was held that the decree was erroneous in giving interest on the interest from a remote day, as interest on interest should have been allowed only from the date of the final decree. Dunbar v. Woodcock, 10 Leigh (Va.) 660.

Subsequent Action on Judgment Including Interest. — Where a subsequent action is brought on a judgment or decree itself consisting of principal and interest and bearing interest, the judgment rendered in such action will bear interest though the effect will be again to compound the interest. Corley v. McKeag, 57 Mo. App. 415; Stuart v. Hurt, 88 Va. 343.

It was held, however, in an action against the personal representatives of a decedent's estate on a judgment obtained against the decedent in his lifetime, that the interest should not be compounded on the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Such latter judg-

(2) Rate. — The rate of interest which a judgment itself consisting of principal and interest will bear is usually a matter of statutory regulation in the several jurisdictions. In some states there are statutes providing that where a judgment is rendered on a contract bearing a stipulated rate of interest, the judgment shall continue to bear interest at such rate until paid. Under these statutes the interest due at the rendition of the judgment is added to the principal, the aggregate bearing interest at the conventional rate thereafter.¹

3. Where Contracted For — a. IN GENERAL. — It has been said that the general rule of law that interest shall not bear interest will yield to an agreement of the parties, express or implied.²

On a Bill in Equity to Redeem Land Mortgaged to secure a debt on which the debtor contracted to pay semiannual interest, it is proper to compute interest on the principal for the first half year, which, together with the principal, will constitute a new principal, upon which in the same manner the interest is to be computed and compounded for each succeeding period.³

Qualifications of Rule. — The doctrine that compound interest is recoverable where there is an express or implied contract for it has, in many cases, been so qualified and limited that it is in no sense an exception to the general rule against compound interest, or interest on interest, as extensive as its terms might seem to indicate.⁴

ment, it was declared, was nothing more than a recognition of the former judgment as a claim against the estate on which interest should be computed according to the rate fixed in the earlier judgment. Quivey v. Hall, 19 Cal. 97.

Doctrine that Judgment Must Not Compound Interest. — In Palmer v. Murray, 8 Mont. 174, a judgment was rendered for the value of exempt property unlawfully seized under a mortgage, with interest from the date of seizure until judgment, such judgment, including accrued interest, itself bearing interest under the law. This was held to have been erroneous, as compounding the interest.

Compounding Interest by Successive Decrees in Same Cause. — Where a decree was entered in a cause ascertaining and fixing the aggregate amount of the plaintiff's debt and giving interest on such aggregate from the date of the decree, as prescribed by Code W. Va., c. 131, § 16, it was held error in a subsequent decree, entered in the same cause several years thereafter, to reaggregate such debt by calculating interest on such first aggregate sum to the date of the latter decree, then adding this interest to the sum of the first decree and giving interest on the second aggregate from the date of the last decree. Tiernan v. Minghini, 28 W. Va. 314.

Edmison*, 3 Dak. 449.

Agreement for Interest on Interest Need Not Be in Writing. — Although there are several dicta in the reports to the effect that an agreement to pay compound interest on the arrears of interest already due must be in writing,¹ these observations should, it has been said, be understood as applying to cases involving mortgages upon lands or other real securities and as recognizing a difference between such securities and personal contracts.²

b. EXPRESS CONTRACTS — (1) Necessity for Express Contract. — Some cases have declared that compound interest cannot be recovered in the absence of an express contract to pay it.³ But this statement is not maintainable as a on provided that "in case any sum of principal or interest shall not be paid when due, [the obligors shall] pay interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum during all the time the same may remain overdue and unpaid." It was held that this provision did not authorize the compounding of interest; that unpaid principal or interest would draw only simple interest until paid, computed without rests. And see Bradley v. Merrill, 91 Me. 346.

On the other hand it seems to have been held in Robertson v. Parrish, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 39 S. W. Rep. 646, that a note providing for semiannual instalments of interest in effect authorizes the holder to compound interest. And see also Preston v. Walker, 26 Iowa 206, 96 Am. Dec. 140.

Doctrine that Interest When Compounded Must Not Exceed Maximum Conventional Rate on Principal. — In Hallam v. Telleren, 55 Neb. 255, it was held that it was competent for a note to provide for the payment of interest at stated periods, and that instalments of interest not paid at the time when they fell due should themselves bear interest, if the whole interest so reserved did not exceed ten per cent. per annum simple interest on the original debt. And see Mathews v. Toogood, 25 Neb. 99; Murtagh v. Thompson, 28 Neb. 358; Richardson v. Campbell, 34 Neb. 181, 33 Am. St. Rep. 633; Lewis Invest. Co. v. Boyd, 48 Neb. 604.

Construction of Particular Contract. — In Goodridge v. Forsman, 79 Me. 133, the plaintiff sold to the defendants the timber on certain lands. The contract of sale required the defendants to cut and take away a specified amount of timber in the winter of each of the years 1881, 1882, and 1883, or, in case of failure to do so, to pay interest to the plaintiff on the amount of the deficiency in each year from May 1 following to May 1, 1884, any timber remaining uncut after May 1, 1884, to be settled for with interest from January 1, 1882; and provided that all timber cut in any year was to be paid for on or before November 1 following, with interest from May 1 preceding, on which day the account of the timber was to be made and adjusted. It was held that the contract was not to be construed as requiring interest upon interest, or double payment of interest, but that interest paid on deficiencies before May 1, 1884, should be credited as prepaid interest on cuttings after that date, and that the stipulation was not so unconscionable that it should be adjudged void. And see Sanford v. Bulkley, 30 Conn. 344.

ing. Rajunder Narian Rae v. Biyai Govind Sing, 2 Moo. P. C. 253.

An Agreement to Compound Interest Oftener than Once a Year, it has been held, cannot be enforced, but in Oregon such a stipulation does not render the agreement void as to the principal sum secured and simple interest. Murray v. Oliver, 3 Oregon 539.

1. Origin of Dicta. — These dicta are believed to have their origin in Brown v. Barkham, 1 P. Wms. 652, which has reference to interest upon arrears of interest upon a mortgage, wherein Lord Parker expressed the opinion that "to make interest on a mortgage principal, it is requisite that there should be a writing signed by the parties, forasmuch as the estate in the land is to be charged therewith."

Rule under Special Statute. — Though under the Colorado statute (Gen. Stat. 1883, § 1708; Mills's Annot. Stat. 1891, § 2253) parties may contract in writing for a rate of interest in excess of the legal rate, yet an oral agreement to compound quarterly simple interest at a rate previously agreed to in writing is invalid. *Beckwith v. What Constitutes Agreement for Compound Interest. — A correspondence took place between a mortgagee and a mortgagor, extending over a series of years, in which the mortgagee stated his intention, if the interest upon the general proposition. It has frequently been held that contracts for compound interest may be implied.¹

(2) Contract for Compound Interest Before Principal Interest Due. — The rule of many cases is that though there is an express contract for compound interest, it will not be upheld where made in advance of the date on which the interest to bear interest is due and payable.²

(3) Contract for Interest on Interest After Interest Due. — The general rule is believed to be that where interest has actually become due and payable, a contract to pay interest thereon is valid and enforceable.³

mortgage debt was not paid, to add it to the principal, and to charge the same interest upon the amount as the mortgage bore. The mortgagor replied from time to time that he could not pay the interest, and that it must be added to the claim of the mortgagee. It was held, however, that on the part of the mortgagor this did not amount to an agreement to pay compound interest, and the claim of the mortgagee was not allowed. Thompson v. Leith, 4 Jur. N. S. 1091.

The mere fact that the debtor, whose debt is secured by mortgage, upon account rendered by the creditor claiming a sum stated to be due for interest, returns answer allowing the account and desiring forbearance and promising to make satisfaction to the mortgagee therefor, will not constitute an agreement to make the interest principal, so as to bear interest thereafter. Brown v. Barkham, 1 P. Wms. 652.

A Vendee of Land, long delinquent for the purchase price, will not be held liable for compound interest merely because, after the vendor has indorsed on the contract as the sum due, the amount arrived at by compounding the interest, the vendee retains the contract for a time without objection. *Jones v. Where Interest in Advance Included in Note — Interest on Total After Maturity. — It has been held that the inclusion in a note payable a specified time after date, of interest until maturity, was not compounding interest, though the note was to bear interest after maturity, because the interest included in the note had been thereby made a part of the principal. *Foard v. Forbearance Sufficient Consideration. — Where there is a contract to pay interest on interest after the principal interest is due, the creditor's forbearance to collect the latter constitutes a sufficient consideration to support the contract.¹

Accrued Interest Embraced in New Note or Security. — In many cases the contract for interest on accrued interest is evidenced by a new note given or embraced in a new security after the interest is payable. The recovery of interest on interest in such instances is always allowed.² And the rule applies though by reason of the contract for interest on interest or by successive contracts of this nature the original principal is permitted to earn a higher rate of interest than permitted by law,³ unless the circumstances are such as to evince an attempt to evade the usury laws.⁴

c. IMPLIED CONTRACTS — (1) In General. — There is no doubt that, though there is no contract for compound interest in so many words, yet the circumstances may be such as to warrant the implication of a contract therefor, with the same effect as though the contract were express.⁵

In Ex p. Bevan, 9 Ves. Jr. 223, the court said: "As to the question of compound interest, it is clear you cannot a priori agree to let a man have money for twelve months, settling the balance at the end of six months, and that the interest shall carry interest for the subsequent six months; that is, you cannot contract for more than five per cent., agreeing to forbear for six months. But if you agree to settle accounts at the end of six months, that not being part of the prior contract, and then stipulate that you will forbear for six months upon those terms, that is legal."

Interest Due Regarded as Principal. — In Eslava v. Lepretre, 21 Ala. 530, 56 Am. Dec. 266, it was held that when interest is once accrued due, it becomes a debt. There is no longer, therefore, any objection to an agreement inter partes that it shall be considered principal and thenceforth carry interest.

3. Successive Contracts for Interest on Interest. — Camp v. Bates, 11 Conn. 488. And see Otis v. Lindsey, 10 Me. 315.

Principle Stated with Qualification. — The computation of interest upon the several payments of interest after they have become due, and putting them into a new security, if done fairly and without taking any unconscientious advantage of the situation and the necessities of the debtor to compel him to agree to such computation, will not invalidate the new security thus taken. *Mowry v. Implication from Course of Dealings. — The charging of compound interest is permitted where the charge is consistent with the established course of dealings between the parties. Camp v. Bates, 11 Conn. 487.

No Implication Except in Peculiar Circumstances. — The law will not imply a promise to pay compound interest except under peculiar circumstances and upon some evidence from which an agreement to turn the interest into principal to bear interest for the future can be inferred. Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162, 23 Am. Rep. 99.

When Implication Arises. — Where a party contracts to pay a sum of money with interest thereon on a given date, the interest becomes principal when the date arrives, and if the debt be not paid the aggregate of principal and interest then due bears interest for the future. Doig v. Barkley, 3 Rich. L. (S. Car.) 125, 45 Am. Dec. 762.

(2) Accounts — (a) General Rule. — The general rule is that interest on the balance of an account stated is recoverable although the sum may include interest on the items contained therein, or on former balances included.¹

Rationale and Requisites. — As the theory of this liability is an implied contract to pay interest on interest, most of the cases hold that in order to warrant the computation of compound interest on an account, such course must be in accordance with the established course of dealings of the parties, or with a general commercial custom known and acquiesced in.²

(b) Contrary Doctrine. — In some cases the right to compound interest in an account by making periodic rests and computing interest on a balance consisting in part of interest has been denied.³

(c) After Cessation of Mutual Dealings. — It has been held that it is not proper for the creditor to calculate compound interest on his account after the mutual dealings between the parties have ceased.⁴

4. Compound Interest as Damages — a. IN GENERAL. — As a general rule, compound interest or interest on interest is never given as damages.⁵

b. COMPOUND INTEREST AFTER MATURITY OF PRINCIPAL. — The doctrine of some jurisdictions seems to be that there can be no recovery of inter-

Interest on Balance of Account Compounded Monthly. — Where the defendants kept an account with the plaintiffs as bankers, and at the end of each month a balance of account was ascertained and entered in the books of both parties, interest being reckoned thereon, and it was shown that such was the custom of bankers, that it was known to the defendant, and that he had never interposed any objection thereto, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to have interest computed on their account by monthly rests, and that the court did not err in refusing to instruct otherwise. *Isett v. c. EFFECT OF DEMAND. — It has been said that interest on interest cannot be recovered simply on the strength of a demand,² but other cases favor a different view.³

In Bannister v. Roberts, 35 Me. 75, it was held that if a note was made payable with interest annually, whether by instalments or otherwise, the interest accruing before the whole of the principal becomes payable may be collected if a suit be commenced to recover it before the whole of the principal becomes payable. If no suit be commenced for that purpose until after that time, interest upon the interest, not paid from the time when it should have been paid, cannot be recovered in a suit for the principal and interest due upon the note. And see Hastings v. Wiswall, 8 Mass. 455; Doe v. Warren, 7 Me. 48; Wilcox v. Howland, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 167.

Where No Interest Payable until Principal Due.

— Where, by the terms of a written contract, interest is payable by instalments at fixed periods and separate from the principal, interest is chargeable on each instalment, at the contract rate, until paid; but where no interest is payable until the principal becomes due, no interest will be allowed except on the principal. Rix v. Strauts, 59 Mich. 364.

2. Doctrine that Demand Does Not Give Right to Interest on Interest. — Whitcomb v. Harris, 90 Me. 206; Lewin v. Folsom, 171 Mass. 188.

3. Doctrine that Demand Gives Right to Interest on Interest. — Mueller v. McGregor, 28 Ohio St. 273; Connecticut v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 13, 7 Am. Dec. 471.

In Howard v. Farley, 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 308, the court held that the general rule that interest should be allowed where by contract money is to be paid at a fixed day, and the contract is broken, ought to be applied to interest payable semiannually according to the condition of a bond, where the interest had been demanded when due; but that if there was no evidence of a demand before suit, then interest should be given only from the institution of the action. See also National Bank v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 94 U. S. 437.

4. Rule under Particular Statutes. — Under a Colorado statute providing that creditors shall be allowed to receive interest, when there is no agreement at the rate thereof, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum for all moneys after they come due, on any bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing, or any judgment, it has been held that compound interest is not recoverable in an action on a note though the note provides that interest is to be paid at stated periods. Denver Brick, etc., Co. v. McAllister, 6 Colo. 261. And see Filmore v. Reithman, 6 Colo. 120.

The Michigan statute (now Comp. Laws 1897, § 4859), permits the compounding of interest on instalments that fall due separately under some "written contract," and does not apply to new interest that accrues merely by lapse of time after the maturity of the debt. Voigt v. Beller, 56 Mich. 140. See also Rix v. Strauts, 59 Mich. 364; Wallace v. Glaser, 82 Mich. 190, 21 Am. St. Rep. 556; McVicar v. Denison, 81 Mich. 348. It has also been decided that this statute, providing that interest may be compounded on overdue instalments of interest upon any note, bond, mortgage, or other written contract, contemplates cases in which instalments of interest fall due by themselves, and can be demanded apart from the principal, and does not apply to an obligation falling due in "one year after date, with annual interest." Hoyle v. Page, 41 Mich. 533.

Under the Vermont statute providing that parties cannot contract for a greater rate of interest than six per cent. per annum, it was held that while the court would not uphold a stipulation for compound interest or for interest on deferred instalments of annual or periodic interest whereby a greater rate than six per cent. on the principal for the entire period of the loan was contracted for, yet the parties might make the interest payable for any time short of the time fixed for the payment of the principal sum, and in such case, if the interest was not paid when due, interest by way of damages would be recoverable upon a subsequent suit brought therefor. Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44.

Doctrine that Interest Becomes Principal on Day when Payment Should Be Made. — In Doig v. Barkley, 3 Rich. L. (S. Car.) 125, 45 Am. Dec. 762, it was held that where a party contracts to pay a sum of money, with interest thereon, on a given day, when the day arrives the interest becomes principal; and if the debt be not paid, the aggregate of principal and interest then due bears interest for the future.

Qualifications of Rule. — In some cases the rule that a party may validly contract for simple interest on interest of the original principal sum, if such latter interest is not paid when due, is qualified by the requirement that the interest on interest should not be at such a rate that the aggregate interest would be in excess of the maximum statutory rate on the original principal for the entire period of the loan. Thus in Nebraska and Vermont it has been held that interest on interest is recoverable only where the interest on the interest together with the interest on the principal sum does not exceed the maximum legal rate recoverable on the principal. Mathews v. Toogood, 25 Neb. 99; Richardson v. Campbell, 27 Neb. 644; Murtagh v. Thompson, 28 Neb. 358; Hallam v. Telleren, 55 Neb. 255; Catlin v. Lyman, 16 Vt. 44.

In other cases, however, it has been held, and, it would seem, upon sound principle, that interest on annual interest is not usurious, though annual interest is at the maximum rate allowed by law. Ragan v. Day, 46 Iowa 239; Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 582. And see Isett v. Oglevie, 9 Iowa 313; Mann v. Cross, 9 Iowa 327; Hershey v. Hershey, 18 Iowa 24; *Preston v. An Interest Clause in a Bond provided that "in case any sum of principal or interest shall not be paid when due, [the obligors shall] pay interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, during all the time the same may remain overdue and unpaid." It was held that this did not authorize the compounding of interest; unpaid principal or interest would draw interest until paid, but without rests. Morgan v. Michigan Air Line R. Co., 57 Mich. 430.

Only Simple Interest Recoverable. — Where the contract is that interest not due shall bear interest if not paid, only simple interest is recoverable thereon — that is, on the interest. Ragan v. Day, 46 Iowa 239.

Rate Recoverable. — Where a recovery of interest on interest is allowed where contracted for, the rate stipulated may be given, provided it is not unlawful. See Dunlap v. Wiseman, 2 Disney (Ohio) 398; Ragan v. Day, 46 Iowa 239.

1. Necessity for Contract After Interest Due. — Campbell v. Bell, 11 Montreal Leg. N. 346.

Thus, in Grimes v. Blake 16 Ind. 160, it was held that when a note stipulates for "ten per cent. interest yearly, from date," even if annual payments can be required before the note falls due, yet a failure in such annual payment does not authorize a compounding unless an agreement has been made to pay interest on the interest after it became due.

A Mere Agreement that Interest Shall Be Payable Annually does not warrant the recovery of interest on interest. In order to such end there should be an agreement, after an interest instalment was due, that interest should be paid thereon. Genin v. Ingersoll, 11 W. Va. 549.

Similarly, an agreement to pay interest on interest, it has been said, "made after the interest has become due, on a contract reserving interest to be paid annually or at stated periods, is not only legal but is generally just and equitable, as founded upon a moral and equitable consideration." Meeker v. Hiel, 23 Conn. 574.

On the Contrary, It Has Been Held that a contract to pay interest on the deferred instalments of interest on the principal sum is valid and enforceable, although made before the interest fell due. Pawling v. Pawling, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 220. See supra, this section, Contract for Compound Interest Before Principal Interest Due.

In O'Neill v. Sims, 1 Strobb. L. (S. Car.) 115, it was said that where a contract for the payment of money after the expiration of several years contains, without any usurious design, an express and bona fide stipulation that interest shall be paid at periods which are at least one year apart, and which will fall before or at the time appointed for the final payment of the principal, interest stipulated to be paid at such period, if not paid, will, like a sum certain appointed in writing to be paid at a certain time, bear interest from the time when it should have been paid.

Kellogg*, 2 Mass. 568, which was an action on a note of hand for the payment of ten thousand dollars in eight years with lawful interest from the date, the interest to be paid annually. Three years of the interest being unpaid, the plaintiff sued for it before the principal was due, and the court held that the action was well brought and gave interest upon each year's interest from the day when it was payable.

Doctrine that Right to Interest on Interest Waived by Failure to Sue. — In some states it is established as a general principle, it has been said, without reference to the distinction respecting the postponement of the payment of the principal, that though there be an express agreement in a note or bond to pay interest at a specified time, as annually or semiannually from date, yet interest upon interest from the time when it fell due will not be allowed, but it will be considered that the holder, by neglecting to call for his interest when it fell due, waived his right to have it converted into principal. Johnson, J., in Genin v. Ingersoll, 11 W. Va. 549.

So in Hastings v. Wiswall, 8 Mass. 455, the court held that upon a note payable in a certain number of years, with interest annually, judgment could be recovered for simple interest only on the principal sum, for the reason that the plaintiff might have brought his action for

7. Summary of Rules. — In view of the considerable conflict of authority upon all questions involving the allowance of compound interest, it is believed that a summary of the rules which seem to be correct in principle and deducible from the reasoning of the best considered cases may be of practical assistance to the reader in enabling him to reconcile for himself conflicting cases or clearly to perceive the precise points of inconsistency: (1) There is no reason, on principle, for holding a contract for compound interest invalid, and the same may be said whether the contract was made before or after the interest on which the debtor contracts to pay interest became due.¹ (2) The contract for compound interest may be implied as well as express.² (3) Interest on interest or compound interest is not, as a rule, recoverable as damages, for the plain reason that simple interest and not compound interest is the legally established measure.³ But this must be taken with the qualification which the terminology of some cases imposes, that all interest recoverable after the maturity of the principal sum is ex necessitate recoverable as damages, though when expressly contracted for after maturity as liquidated damages, or, rather, damages to be estimated by a liquidated measure. In this view, if there were a stipulation for annual interest after the maturity of the principal sum, and interest thereon if not paid, there might or should be a recovery of interest on interest as damages.⁴ (4) The effect of a contract the interest at the end of each year, and by neglecting this he might be considered as waiving his claim to compound interest.

1. General Doctrine of Validity of Contract for Interest on Interest or Compound Interest. — It might well be, however, if a contract provided for the compounding of interest at very frequent intervals — for example, the extreme case of a contract for interest compounded daily — that equity would properly find some ground for intervention and relief. But where the contract contemplates that the interest should be actually paid at the intervals stated, or where the intervals for compounding are not so frequent as to suggest an unconscionable contract, it is believed that the contract for compound interest or interest on interest should in all cases be sustained, in the absence, of course, of a statute to the contrary. Where a contract for compound interest is made after the interest upon which interest was contracted for becomes due, there can be in general no question of unconscionableness, the debtor's attention being specially called to the matter with full knowledge of the extent of the liability which he is incurring. And furthermore, such a contract made after interest due would be persuasive if not conclusive evidence that it had been contemplated by the parties that the first interest was to be actually paid, and so the contract for interest on interest would be founded upon the new consideration of forbearance in the collection of the interest already due.

2. Doctrine that Contract for Compound Interest May Be Implied as Well as Express. — But as has been pointed out, where the law may imply a contract for interest, it will, in the absence of special circumstances, prefer to imply a contract for simple interest rather than compound interest. There are several reasons for this position, none of which, however, warrant the general statement frequently met with, that the law will never imply a contract for compound interest. The fact of the matter is that compound interest is to a certain extent extraordinary and unusual, involving a computation sometimes complicated and peculiar, in view of which circumstances it is more difficult to say from the mere conduct of parties that a contract to pay compound interest was intended. It would be as reasonable to state as a general proposition that the law will not imply a contract to build a house as that no contract for compound interest will be implied. If one party desires to have another erect a dwelling for him, he generally finds it necessary to enter into an express contract for the purpose; so if one party desires another to pay to him interest on interest on interest, and so on ad infinitum, it is generally necessary that there should be an express contract to such end, because the dumb vocabulary of mere conduct is generally too limited to express such an intent. There is, however, absolutely nothing inherent in the nature of compound interest which prevents the implication of a contract to pay it, as is amply illustrated by the case of accounts, in which compound interest is, as has been seen, frequently given on the grounds of a contract to pay it implied from custom.

3. Compound Interest as Damages. — There are many cases, of course, in which interest is recoverable as damages for breach of a contract to pay another sum, though the latter may itself be the interest of some other sum. But in such case it is not interest on interest which is recoverable as damages; the sum due, and for the failure to pay which interest is given, being simply regarded as another sum of money, and interest given thereon as damages for the failure to pay.

4. Some Cases Hold, as Has Been Seen, that no interest on interest is ever recoverable, where the interest on which interest is sought has accrued after the maturity of the principal. It is difficult to trace this doctrine to any foundation of sound principle. It may perhaps have originated in cases where there was no contract for interest on interest after maturity, when only simple interest as damages for interest on interest with reference to statutes limiting the conventional rate belongs more properly to an article which will appear in a later volume of this work.¹ But it is believed to be a safe statement, as a loose general rule, that interest on interest at a rate not greater than the statute permits should never be held usurious where payment of the interest instalments was actually contemplated on the dates fixed, although the aggregate of interest on interest would, if contracted for on the original principal, exceed the rate allowed by law.²

XV. WHAT LAW GOVERNS, AND CONFLICT OF LAWS — 1. Interest by Contract — a. GENERALLY. — Where a contract for interest is made in one state or county to be performed in another, the question arises, By what law is the contract to be controlled as to the right of recovery of interest and the rate of interest recoverable? And where, as is often the case, the action is brought in still a third jurisdiction, the law of the latter must also be taken into consideration in determining what law governs.³

b. EXPRESS CONTRACTS — (1) Law of Place with Reference to Which Contract Made. — The general rule is that a contract for interest will be governed, as to the right of recovery thereunder, by the law of the place with reference to which, in good faith, the contract is made.⁴

would be recoverable on the principal. But why, if the instalments of interest continue to accrue and become payable annually, should not interest be allowed on them as damages for the breach of contracts to pay money? There are also cases that have held that interest on interest was not recoverable except where the interest on the principal was evidenced by some contract therefor, separable from the contract for the principal sum, which might be negotiated with third parties; and other cases have actually required that such separable contracts for interest should be so negotiated before interest is allowed as damages for their breach.

1. See the title USURY.

2. Where Payment of Interest Instalments Actually Contemplated. — In a jurisdiction, for example, in which the conventional rate of interest was limited to twelve per cent. per annum, a contract for interest at the rate of one per cent. per month, compounded monthly, would not, in general, be upheld. But if the payment of interest each month was actually contemplated, it is believed that a contract might in advance validly provide that if the interest was not paid when due it should become principal, and be subject to monthly compoundings thereafter. There is probably no case which holds that the parties might not properly come together after the interest had become due and promise to pay interest thereon thereafter. Suppose, in the case mentioned, the parties should meet at the end of the first month and the debtor should execute his note payable a month thence with interest from date. This process might be repeated the next month, and so on throughout the year, which would be compounding interest monthly. If the parties have a right to do this as stated, it is not perceived why the same result should not be permitted by a contract in advance, provided, of course, the debtor fairly understands the nature and effect of his obligation, and the contract is not resorted to as a device to evade the usury laws. There would be much less difficulty in giving simple interest on the monthly instalments of interest as they fell due, and this course, it is believed, should be adopted in all cases where the payment of the interest instalment was actually contemplated. As a matter of course, it would probably be difficult to make it appear, in the rather extreme case taken above for illustration, that the compounding of interest monthly was not either a device to evade the law limiting the rate or a contract which the debtor did not clearly understand, because by it a so much higher rate of interest on the principal sum first received would be paid than a thoughtless or ignorant person would realize at the outset. In many instances nothing less than compound interest would compensate the creditor, and anything less than compound interest would be, in a sense, permitting the debtor to take advantage of his own wrong. This might readily be the case if the creditor were a bank, with a demand for its funds for short-time loans. Finally, the writer's position is simply this: if the parties may, lawfully and without evasion, accomplish a certain result by a succession of several acts neither illegal nor immoral, they should be permitted to contract for the same result in the beginning, provided, of course, the debtor fully understands the extent of the liability assumed. Perhaps the most important consideration in this connection, and one which in most cases might safely be permitted to control, is whether it was or was not contemplated that the interest should be actually paid at the time when the compoundings are to be made. If so, then at least simple interest on the deferred interest payments should be given.

Place Where Contract Entered Into — Place of Performance. — The parties may validly contract with reference to the laws of either the place of performance of the contract or the jurisdiction in which the contract is executed.¹

And Where the Circumstances of the Contract Leave It Doubtful whether the contract for interest was made with reference to the law of the place where it was entered into or that where the money was payable, that construction which will render the contract operative according to its terms should, in general, be adopted, rather than that which will render it void.²

(2) Place Where Contract Entered Into. — Although, as will be seen hereafter, the law of the place of the performance of the contract will be regarded as having been intended by the parties in the absence of a showing to the contrary, yet in many cases the law of the place where the contract was entered into will be taken as that which the contracting parties appear to have had in view.³

A Contract for the Payment of Interest, if Valid Where Made, will be maintained by payable there. The maker was a Wyoming corporation, but most of its property was situated and most of its business transacted in Nebraska. The payee was a resident of Wyoming. The note provided for interest at the rate of fifteen per cent. per annum, which was lawful in Wyoming, where the note was made. It was secured by mortgages executed in Wyoming on property situated in Nebraska, the rate of interest provided for being unlawful in the latter state. The payee and mortgagee went to Nebraska for the purpose of examining the records, found no incumbrances, and received the note and mortgages there. There was evidence tending to show that the agreement for the loan was made in Wyoming in good faith. It was held that a finding that the note was governed by the interest laws of Wyoming was proper. Coad v. Home Cattle Co., 32 Neb. 761, 29 Am. St. Rep. 465. See also Cocke v. Hatcher (Tenn. 1887) 4 S. W. Rep. 170.

Marriage Settlement — Law of State Where Lands Situated. — In Quince v. Callender, 1 Desaus. (S. Car.) 160, it was held that though the marriage bond in the bill mentioned was dated in North Carolina, yet, as the lands on which the settlement was made were situated in South Carolina, the interest of the latter state should be allowed.

Note Dated in One State but Actually Executed in Another. — It has been held that although a note was dated and made payable in one state, but actually executed in another, it might be controlled by the interest laws of the latter state upon averment and proof that it was so dated and made payable through inadvertence, the real intent being that it should operate under the laws of the state where it was in fact made. Johnson City First Nat. Bank v. Mann, 94 Tenn. 17.

But where a note was actually dated and executed in one state, yet, under the circumstances, the transaction in which the note was involved was consummated in another state, where the note was also made payable, it was held that it would be governed as to the effect of a stipulation for interest entirely by the laws of the latter jurisdiction. *McGarry v. Unconscionable Contract. — In Sime v. Norris, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 84, it was held that a contract made in California to pay monthly two and a half per cent. interest, and to compound it, though lawful under the local law, was not only unconscionable, but deceptive; and a court of law in Pennsylvania would not enforce it, but would enter judgment for the principal and simple interest at ten per cent.

Where the Defendant's Comakers in a Promissory Note made and payable in New Mexico and bearing ten per cent. interest, a rate not illegal in that state, after a partial payment thereon undertook, in the absence of the defendant, to renew the note for the balance still due, and accordingly executed a new note dated in New Mexico and stipulating for the same rate of interest, and the defendant afterwards, in a state in which more than six per cent. interest was illegal, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, also signed the new note, it was held that he thereby ratified the agreement made by his co-obligors, and the new note would be regarded as made in New Mexico and governed by the laws of such jurisdiction in respect to the rate of interest accruing thereon and the legal effect of the stipulation for interest embodied therein. Findlay v. Hall, 12 Ohio St. 610.

Loans Within Dominions of Indian Sovereigns. — The rate of interest for loans advanced within the dominions of native and independent Indian sovereigns by British subjects domiciled and residing within such dominions is not, it has been held, limited to twelve per cent. by the statute of 13 Geo. question would not give the right to compound interest, that such interest might nevertheless be recovered.¹

A Contract Intended to Be Performed Partly in One State and Partly in Another may be treated by the parties as a contract of either jurisdiction and interest recovered accordingly.²

Place of Performance to Be Fixed in Good Faith. — In order that parties in one jurisdiction may validly contract with reference to the interest laws of a foreign place of performance, it is requisite that the latter should be fixed in good faith and not for the purpose of evading the laws of the place where the contract is entered into.³

How Place of Execution or Performance of Contract Shown — Parol Evidence. — The authorities are not agreed on the subject, but the general rule seems to be that parol evidence is admissible to show that a contract for the payment of money and interest thereon was entered into or was to be performed at a place other than that stated in the contract as such.⁴

(b) Stipulation for Interest Without Naming Rate. — Pursuant to the rule above stated, where there is a contract for interest but no rate is specified, interest will in general be computed according to the rate of the place where the contract should have been performed, i. e., the place where the money should have been paid.⁵

Doctrine that Parol Evidence Inadmissible. — In Arrington v. Gee, 5 Ired. L. (27 N. Car.) 590, it was held that in order to change the rule of presumption that the contract is to be performed where executed, the stipulation for performance elsewhere must appear on the face of the contract.

Where a Bond or Note Fails to Designate the Place of Payment, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that by agreement between the parties it was to be paid at a place different from that of the contract, so that the interest law of the latter place may control. Moore v. Davidson, 18 Ala. 209.

which in terms seem to state that it is the law of the place where the contract is made rather than the law of the place of performance which will control in the matter of interest.¹ But such cases all are, or should be, cases of contracts not specifying any particular place of payment or performance, when the presumption always is that the place where the contract was entered into was also intended as the place of performance.² Some cases state the general rule in this connection, as that it is the law of the place where the contract is made which is primarily taken, which, however, will yield to the law of the place of performance where the contract is to be performed elsewhere than where made.³

(4) Place Where Suit Brought. — Where interest is contracted for, but there is nothing to show where the contract was executed or to be performed, it has been held that interest according to the lex fori may be given.⁴ In some cases also the law of the place where suit brought governs the allowance of interest where the contract was made with reference to the law of a foreign jurisdiction, if it is not shown what that law is.⁵

1. See, for example, Burton v. Anderson, 1 Tex. 93, in which it was said: "Interest is conceded to be a creature of local law, and is governed by the law of the country where the contract is made or the debt incurred." See also Nalle v. Ventress, 19 La. Ann. 373, where ten per cent. interest was allowed "as stipulated in the note, and authorized by the law of Mississippi, where the contract was made."

2. Place of Contract as Place of Performance. — Stickney v. Jordan, 58 Me. 106, 4 Am. Rep. 251; Chase v. Dow, 47 N. H. 405; Jones v. Rider, 60 N. H. 452; Arrington v. Gee, 5 Ired. L. (27 N. Car.) 590; Clark v. Searight, 135 Pa. St. 173, 20 Am. St. Rep. 868.

Note Secured by Mortgage on Lands in Another State. — The fact that the note given was secured by a mortgage on lands in another state in which the rate of interest or the method of computation differed from that of the state in which the note was executed, is not sufficient to change the rule. Chase v. Dow, 47 N. H. 405.

In Lewis v. Ingersoll, 3 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 55, it was held that creditors resident in Pennsylvania, where the limit of interest was six per cent., holding a mortgage executed in New York on lands in that state, might receive seven per cent. interest thereon, if there was nothing to indicate where the securities were payable, nor that a different rate of interest from that allowed by the laws of New York was intended.

Domicil of Creditor Not Considered. — It has been held that a contract payable generally, naming no place of payment, will be regarded as payable at the place of contract, and not where the domicil of the creditor may be. Arrington v. Gee, 5 Ired. L. (27 N. Car.) 590. But in Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 627, 31 Am. Dec. 264, it was declared that where a mere personal security is given for the payment of money loaned, and no place of payment is specified therein, the residence of the lender at the time of giving such security must be considered as the place of payment for the purpose of deciding the validity of a stipulation for interest.

3. Fanning v. Consequa, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 511, 8 Am. Dec. 442. See also Chase v. Dow, 47 N. H. 405; Butters v. Olds, 11 Iowa 1.

4. Lex Fori — Uncertainty as to Place of Execution or Performance of Contract. — Cook v. Crawford, 4 Tex. 420.

Illustrations. — Where a note sued on in Texas was dated at Philadelphia, but there was no proof that Philadelphia was beyond the limits of the state, it was held that interest was properly computed at the legal rate of the state in which the action was brought. Cook v. Crawford, 4 Tex. 420.

Where a note sued on in Greene county, Alabama, was described as made "at Virginia, to wit, in Greene county," it was held that the court would presume Virginia to be some place in the county where the action was brought, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, and would be governed by the legal rate of interest existing in Alabama. Richardson v. Williams, 2 Port. (Ala.) 239.

In another case, where two notes sued on in Texas appeared to have been executed in New York and payable "at office of Commercial and Agricultural Bank of Texas, in New Orleans," it was held that the court could not from this alone judicially know that New York and New Orleans were beyond the limits of the state, and hence that the interest recoverable would be according to the rate prevailing in Texas. Whitlock v. Castro, 22 Tex. 108.

But see Pawling v. Sartain, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 238, holding that in an action brought in Kentucky on a note made and to be paid in New York, the court would judicially know that New York was not in Kentucky, and could not, therefore, apply the Kentucky rate of interest as damages for the breach of the contract; interest, if allowable, being governed by the law of New York.

In Smith v. Robinson, 11 Ala. 270, it was held in Alabama that where a promissory note was dated at Macon and was "payable at either of the banks in Macon," it could not, in the absence of allegation or proof, be intended that Macon was in another state, so as to devolve upon the plaintiff the necessity of proving the rate of interest abroad; especially, it was held, as there were a county and perhaps several villages called Macon in the state in which the suit was brought, though there was no incorporated bank in either.

c. IMPLIED CONTRACTS. — As to the law controlling, as between the place of contract, performance, or suit brought, there is no difference whatever between express and implied contracts for interest.¹

2. Interest as Damages — a. DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — (1) Law of Place of Performance. — Where interest is given as damages and not by virtue of a contract for it, the general rule is that the rate recoverable is according to the law of the place of performance, irrespective of the law of the place where the contract was entered into or the jurisdiction in which the suit is brought.²

In Raymond v. Holmes, 11 Tex. 54, it was observed that the English rule was that interest as damages on a bill of exchange is recoverable according to the place where the bill is payable, whether recourse be had upon the drawer or the indorser of the bill. Thus, where a bill was drawn and accepted in Paris, and was payable in England, the drawer and acceptor living in Paris, and no rate of interest being expressed as payable on the bill, it was held that, the default being made in England, interest was payable according to the English and not the French law. Cooper v. Waldegrave, 2 Beav. 282. See also Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1077, where a bill of exchange drawn in France for money lent there and made payable in England was deemed a contract subject to the laws of England and to bear English interest.

But in Gibbs v. Fremont, 9 Exch. 25, 17 Jur. 820, 22 L. J. Exch. 302, it was held that if a bill of exchange on the face of which no interest is reserved is drawn in one country, payable in another, the drawer is liable on its dishonor to pay as damages interest at the current rate in the country where the bill was drawn.

(2) Place Where Contract Made as Place of Performance. — Where a contract does not provide for a different place of performance, the place where it was made will be deemed to have been intended, and the rate of such jurisdiction will be given as damages for the breach.¹

(3) Law of Place of Suit. — In some cases the rule adopted has been to give interest according to the rate of the lex fori when it is recovered as damages and not by virtue of a contract to pay it.²

Where Promissory Notes Are Payable Generally, with no place of payment fixed, the general rule has been held to be that the lex fori governs in the collection thereof; and where no interest has been provided for therein, the interest after a breach of the contract is recoverable, if allowed, as damages; and where interest is adjudged as damages upon such contracts the rate of interest will be governed by the law of the place of suit.³

b. DAMAGES FOR TORT. — Whether interest should be given as part of the compensation in damages for a tort, seems generally to have been determined with reference to the jurisdiction in which the cause of action arose.⁴

3. Foreign Judgments — a. LAW OF JURISDICTION WHERE JUDGMENT RENDERED. — In an action in one jurisdiction on a judgment rendered in another it has been held that the right of recovery of interest and the rate

Rhode Island. — Kavanaugh v. Day, 10 R. I. 393, 14 Am. Rep. 691.

A Promissory Note Dated at New York without designating the place of payment will bear the legal rate of interest as established by the laws of that state after maturity. Hoppins v. Miller, 17 N. J. L. 185.

So in an action in Kentucky on a note executed in New York, with no place of payment specified, it was held that the recovery of interest as damages would be governed by the law of the latter state. Pawling v. Sartain, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 238.

Bond Secured by Realty in Another State. — Interest as damages for the nonpayment of bonds at maturity is to be computed by the laws of the state where the bonds with the mortgage to secure them were executed and the parties resided, if no other place of payment is expressed, although the mortgage is upon real estate situated in another state. Kavanaugh v. Day, 10 R. I. 393, 14 Am. Rep. 691.

Action by Assignee of Government Claim — Transaction in Foreign Country. — An assignee for a valuable consideration of a claim upon the government, which was, however, collected by a third person under an authority given by the assignor previous to the assignment, is entitled to recover the amount of the consideration paid for the assignment with interest from the time of the presentation of the claim to the government, such interest, however, to be computed according to the legal rate of the forum, although the transaction took place in a foreign country. Eaton v. Mellus, 7 Gray (Mass.) 566.

3. Promissory Notes Payable Generally. — Kopelke v. Kopelke, 112 Ind. 435.

4. Damages for Tort. — New York, etc., R. Co. v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591; Bischoffsheim v. Baltzer, 21 Fed. Rep. 531.

In Holmes v. Barclay, 4 La. Ann. 63, which was an action for damages done to the property of the plaintiff, situated in another state, by a steamer belonging to the defendants, it was held that as by the laws of the state in which the injury was done the jury might have allowed injuries on the amount of the damages assessed, the plaintiffs would be allowed in an action in Louisiana to recover interest on the damages assessed from the date of judicial demand. In this case the court said that as in Illinois, where the cause of action accrued, it would have been competent for the jury to allow interest in making up the estimates of damages, the plaintiffs should be entitled to the same indemnity in the state where the action was brought.

Tortious Sale of Vessel. — In Ekins v. East-India Co., 1 P. Wms. 395, it was decided that for the tortious sale of the plaintiff's ship in India by his agent there to the defendant, the latter should account for the value in India with twelve per cent. interest, according to the laws of that country, deducting only the charge of remittance to England, where the remedy was sought.

recoverable were dependent on the law of the state or country in which the judgment sued on was rendered.¹

b. LAW OF PLACE WHERE SUIT BROUGHT. — In opposition to the doctrine above announced, other cases hold the matter of interest upon a foreign judgment to be determinable solely by the law of the place where the action on the foreign judgment is brought.² And this rule has been held to apply irrespective of any provision in the foreign judgment itself with reference to interest thereon.³

4. Proof of Interest Law of Foreign Jurisdiction — a. IN GENERAL. — Where interest is recoverable according to the law of a foreign jurisdiction, such law must, in general, be proved.⁴ But in the absence of such proof the courts in the several jurisdictions are not agreed on the course to be pursued. The rule of some cases, in such circumstances, is to deny all interest whatever. Others resort to the lex fori in the absence of a proper showing of the interest law which should, in principle, control. Still others prefer to presume the existence of the common law on a failure of proof to the contrary.⁵

Where Interest Expressly Stipulated For. — Where there is an express contract for interest at a rate specified, executed or to be performed in a foreign jurisdiction, the general rule is that its validity will be presumed in the absence of a

1. Interest According to Law of Jurisdiction Where Judgment Rendered — Alabama. — Clarke v. Pratt, 20 Ala. 470; Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 630, 56 Am. Dec. 227; Crawford v. Simonton, 7 Port. (Ala.) 110; Murray v. Cone, 8 Port. (Ala.) 250; Hunt v. Mayfield, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 124.

California. — Thompson v. Monrow, 2 Cal. 90, 56 Am. Dec. 318; Cavender v. Guild, 4 Cal. 250.

Illinois. — Prince v. Lamb, 1 Ill. 378; Warren v. McCarthy, 25 Ill. 95.

Kentucky. — Reynolds v. Powers, 96 Ky. 481; Brown v. Todd, (Ky. 1895) 29 S. W. Rep. 621.

Missouri. — Crone v. Dawson, 19 Mo. App. 214.

Pennsylvania. — Schell v. Stetson, 12 Phila. (Pa.) 187, 34 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 114.

Thus in an action brought in Pennsylvania on a New York judgment for costs and disbursements, it has been held that interest would be allowed, because such was the law of the state of New York, although in Pennsylvania interest on such a judgment was not recoverable. Schell v. Stetson, 12 Phila. (Pa.) 187, 34 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 114.

But in Gatewood v. Palmer, 10 Humph. (Tenn.) 466, it appeared that Palmer recovered a judgment against Gatewood in the state of Alabama for damages and costs, and suit was brought on the transcript of the record in Tennessee, and there was judgment for damages and costs, and interest on both damages and costs. This was held erroneous, the plaintiff, it was said, being entitled to judgment for the damages and costs and to interest on the damages, but not on the costs.

Where Judgment Provides for Interest. — Interest may be recovered in an action on a foreign judgment which in terms provides for interest. Arnott v. Redfern, 3 Bing. 353, 13 E. C. L. 3. And in an action on a judgment rendered in a foreign state, directing that a portion thereof bear interest at a specified rate, but silent as to the rate of interest on the residue, interest on the balance may be computed at the rate allowed by the law of the foreign state. Stewart v. Spaulding, 72 Cal. 264. See, however, Atkinson v. Braybrooke, 4 Campb. 380, in which the doctrine that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest in an action on a foreign judgment was announced without qualification.

As to the Effect of Failure of Proof of the foreign law in an action on a foreign judgment, the right to recover interest upon which is regarded as controlled by the law of the jurisdiction in which the foreign judgment was rendered, see infra, this section, Proof of Interest Law of Foreign Jurisdiction.

Rule by Statute. — It has been held in Missouri that Rev. Stat. 1879, § 2725 (Rev. Stat. 1899, § 3707), giving interest on judgments from the date of their rendition, applies to the judgments of other states when made the foundation of proceedings in Missouri courts. Shickle v. Watts, 94 Mo. 410.

5. See infra, this division of this section, Consequences of Failure of Proof.

b. FOREIGN INTEREST LAW NOT SUBJECT OF JUDICIAL NOTICE. — Whatever disagreement there may be as to the course to be pursued where a foreign interest law properly controlling the case is not proved, the authorities generally concur in holding, in the absence of a statute changing the rule, that the interest law of another jurisdiction is not a subject of judicial cognizance, but must be established by evidence as any other fact.³

Excessive Interest. — When a promissory note is made in a sister state, payable with interest at the rate of five per cent. per month after maturity, in the nature of a penalty to secure prompt payment, it will be presumed that it was made in conformity to the laws of the place where executed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary. Smith v. Whitaker, 23 Ill. 367.

But in a Pennsylvania case it was held that a contract made in California to pay monthly two and a half per cent. interest, and to compound it, though lawful under the local law, was not only unconscionable but deceptive; and a court of law in Pennsylvania would not enforce it, but would enter judgment for the principal and simple interest at ten per cent. Sime v. Norris, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 84. And see Brown's Estate, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 197.

Rule under Particular Statute. — Under a statute providing that in actions brought within the state on debts created without, it should be presumed in the absence of a showing to the contrary that the rate of the forum prevailed in the foreign jurisdiction, it was held that a note executed in another state bearing a higher rate of interest than that permitted by the domestic laws would not sustain a recovery according to its terms, in the absence of pleading and proof of a foreign statute warranting the rate of interest contracted for. Templeton v. Sharp, (Ky. 1888) 9 S. W. Rep. 696.

Case Contrary to General Rule. — In Booty v. Cooper, 18 La. Ann. 565, which was an action on a promissory note, due one day after date, bearing twelve per cent. interest from date, the court held that where there was nothing in the record showing the lex loci contractus, interest on the promissory note would not be allowed at a higher rate than that permitted by the laws of the state where the note was sued on.

See the title FOREIGN LAWS, vol. 13, p. 1050.

Rate After Judgment. — It has been usually held that, no matter by what interest law an obligation is controlled, after judgment rendered, interest will be governed, in the jurisdiction in which the judgment is obtained, by the law of such jurisdiction.¹

c. HOW FOREIGN INTEREST LAW PROVEN — (1) In General. — The subject of proof of foreign laws has been fully discussed in another place,² and the general rules there announced apply without exception in principle to the proof of foreign interest laws.³ A few cases, however, with particular reference to the proof of the interest laws of a foreign jurisdiction, will be found in the notes below.⁴

(2) Interest by Custom. — Where in a foreign jurisdiction interest is regulated by custom, and not by written law, it is competent to establish such fact by proof. Where this is done, the fact that there may be no statute for interest will not prevent its recovery.⁵

In an Action on a Judgment Rendered by the Courts of Another State the legal rate of interest therein is a matter of fact to be proven and cannot be judicially noticed. Cavender v. Guild, 4 Cal. 250.

So in an action of debt in Alabama, upon a judgment rendered in Mississippi, it has been held error to render judgment final by nil dicit, without the intervention of a jury, for the amount of the debt and eight per cent. interest thereon as damages. Clarke v. Pratt, 20 Ala. 470.

But in Schell v. Stetson, 12 Phila. (Pa.) 187, 34 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 114, it was held that the courts of one state will, in an action on a judgment rendered by the courts of another state, take judicial notice of the laws of the latter with reference to the right to recover interest.

Express Provision in Judgment for Interest. — When the judgment of another state provides in terms that it shall carry interest at a given rate from a specified time, interest may be recovered accordingly without a further showing that judgments carry interest by the statute law of the state in which the judgment was rendered. Hudson v. Daily, 13 Ala. 722.

Interest Table Prepared by Secretary of State. — The court of one state cannot take judicial notice of the rate of interest in a sister state, merely from the table of interest prepared by the secretary of state, and appended to the acts of the legislature, as required by statute. The rate of interest must be ascertained by a jury, and the table appended to the acts is only prima facie evidence, which may be rebutted by other proof. Clarke v. Pratt, 20 Ala. 470; Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Talman, 15 Ala. 472; Insurance Co. of North America v. Forcheimer, 86 Ala. 541; Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 629, 56 Am. Dec. 227. And see Camp, etc., Co. v. Randle, etc., Co., 81 Ala. 240.

Presumption in Favor of Jury's Finding. — It has been said that in the absence of proof of the legal rate of interest of another state the finding of the jury will be presumed to be correct. Holley v. Holley, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 505, 12 Am. Dec. 342; Henry v. Halsey, 5 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 573.

1. Rate of Interest After Judgment. — Bodily v. Bellamy, 2 Burr. 1094; Gordon v. Phelps, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 619; Neil v. Idaho First Nat. Bank, 50 Ohio St. 193.

Terms of Contract. — Where a contract executed in a foreign jurisdiction provides for interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum until paid, a stipulation valid in the state where the contract was made, and suit is brought and a decree had in another state, interest at the same rate is payable after the decree as before, without regard to the legal rate of interest in the state where the decree is rendered. Shipman v. Bailey 20 W. Va. 140.

2. See the title FOREIGN LAWS, vol. 13, p. 1050.

3. Where the Rate of Interest Is Fixed by the Written Law of a Country it must be proven, in general, as any other fact; that is to say, by the best evidence that can be procured. And this has, in most cases of foreign written law, been held to be by an authentic copy, under the great seal of the state. But as between the several states of the Union, it has been held that a collection of acts printed and published in a book purporting to be by the authority of the state, after being proved by some party, supposed to be well informed on the subject, to be the written law of the state, is evidence that such is the law. Burton v. Anderson, 1 Tex. 93.

4. Statutes Best Evidence. — Murray v. Cone, 8 Port. (Ala.) 250; Deem v. Crume, 46 Ill. 69; Forsyth v. Baxter, 3 Ill. 9.

To Prove in the Federal Courts the rate of interest allowed in any one of the United States, it has been said that the law of the state should be produced, on the ground that in the several states of the Union the rate of interest is regulated by law; and therefore any other species of evidence than the law itself is inadmissible. Jaffray v. Dennis, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 253.

Rule of Canadian Case — Rate Ascertained by Master. — In Souther v. Wallace, 11 Nova Scotia 548, 1 Can. L. T. 556, a verdict for the plaintiff for a certain amount "with interest" was held to be a verdict on which judgment might be entered up, although the note on which the action was brought was payable in Boston, U. S., and specified no rate of interest. In such circumstances the rate of interest at the place of payment, at the time of the trial, is to be ascertained by a master of the court.

5. Interest in Foreign Jurisdiction by Custom. — Courtois v. Carpentier, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 376; Cowqua v. Lauderbrun, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 521; Jaffray v. Dennis, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 253; Young v. Godbe, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 562; Crawford v. Simonton, 7 Port. (Ala.) 110; Murray v. Cone,

d. CONSEQUENCES OF FAILURE OF PROOF — (1) No Interest Where Foreign Law Not Shown. — It has been held that where a contract not stipulating for interest is shown to have been made with reference to the law of another jurisdiction, no interest at all is recoverable in the absence of proof that interest is recoverable by virtue of such foreign law.¹

(2) Interest by Law of Forum. — Where, though a contract is properly governable by a foreign law, it is not shown what this is, the rule of some courts is to apply the law of the jurisdiction in which the suit is brought.²

(3) Interest According to Rule of Common Law. — It has been held that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the common law as to interest would be presumed by the courts of one state to exist in another, and would be applied by the courts of the former in actions on contracts made with reference to the laws of the latter.³

XVI. DISCRETIONARY INTEREST, AND INTEREST AS MATTER OF RIGHT — 1. In General. — This question is one in which the evolution of the general law of interest is well illustrated.

The rule of the earlier authorities that interest was recoverable in no case unless expressly contracted for, or the circumstances of the transaction plainly evinced an intent that it should be paid, has already been stated.⁴ The first

1. No Interest Where Foreign Law Is Not Shown — Alabama. — Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 630, 56 Am. Dec. 227; Murray v. Cone, 8 Port. (Ala.) 250; Hunt v. Mayfield, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 124.

California. — Cavender v. Guild, 4 Cal. 250. Kentucky. — Davidson v. Gohagin, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 634; Russell v. Shepherd, Hard. (Ky.) 48; Holley v. Holley, Litt. Sel. Cas. (Ky.) 505, 12 Am. Dec. 342; Ingraham v. Arnold, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 406; Johnsons v. Williams, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 489. But the present doctrine in this state is that in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a judgment of a sister state sued on there bears interest from the date of its rendition at a like rate of interest as judgments rendered in Kentucky, the earlier rule having been changed by statute. Reynolds v. Powers, 96 Ky. 481. So also as to a promissory note made elsewhere. See Templeton v. Sharp, (Ky. 1888) 9 S. W. Rep. 696.

Washington. — Ritchie v. Carpenter, 2 Wash. 512, 26 Am. St. Rep. 877.

Canada. — Griffin v. Judson, 12 U. C. C. P. 430.

It Will Be Presumed, in the Absence of Proof to the Contrary, that the rate of interest in a foreign jurisdiction is the same as that in which the suit is brought. Deem v. Crume, 46 Ill. 69; Hallam v. Telleren, 55 Neb. 255.

Judgments. — In the absence of evidence of the rate of interest in another state, interest on a judgment there rendered should be calculated at the rate of the forum. Prince v. Lamb, 1 Ill. 378; Deem v. Crume, 46 Ill. 69; Crone v. Dawson, 19 Mo. App. 214; Shickle v. Watts, 94 Mo. 410; Ritchie v. Carpenter, 2 Wash. 512, 26 Am. St. Rep. 877.

3. As the Common Law Is Presumed to Be in Force in other states unless the contrary is shown, and at common law judgments do not carry interest, interest is not recoverable on a judgment rendered by the courts of another state without proof that the law of such state allows interest on judgments. Thompson v. Monrow, 2 Cal. 99, 56 Am. Dec. 318. See generally the title COMMON LAW, vol. 6, p. 280 et seq.

But It Has Been Held that This Presumption Should Be Limited to the states or territory formerly subject to the common law of England. Hofheimer v. Losen, 24 Mo. App. 659; White v. Chaney, 20 Mo. App. 396; Crone v. Dawson, 19 Mo. App. 214.

4. See supra, this title, Origin and History of Interest.

step from this position seems to have been to allow interest in the discretion of the jury as damages for the breach of a contract to pay money. This same discretion was later extended by some courts to actions for the breach of contracts to deliver chattels having an ascertainable pecuniary value, as well as in actions of tort for damages to real or personal property, as part of the compensation to which the injured party was entitled. Later the principle became fixed in some jurisdictions to allow interest as of right in such cases.¹

2. Interest by Contract. — Where interest has been expressly or impliedly contracted for it is — provided, of course, the contract is valid — recoverable as of right, and is not subject to the discretion of court or jury.² And the rule is the same, of course, where the debtor has contracted to pay interest after the maturity of the contract, although in such circumstances it is in a sense liquidated damages for the breach of the undertaking.³ But whether the circumstances of the transaction raise an implied contract to pay interest may often be, and in fact generally is, a question for the jury.⁴

3. Interest as Damages — a. IN GENERAL. — The statement is frequently met with that when interest, if recoverable at all, is given as damages and not by virtue of a contract to pay it, it is within the discretion of the jury to allow or disallow it.⁵ But however it may have been in early days, this doc-

1. Tendency Towards Allowance of Interest as Rule of Legal Right. — There has been in the main a steady advance of the state of the law from a disposition to allow no interest, through the stages of considering it as a matter of discretion for either the court or the jury, towards a rule of legal right. Nashua, etc., R. Corp. v. Boston, etc., R. Corp., 61 Fed. Rep. 237. See also Lewis v. Rountree, 79 N. Car. 122, 28 Am. Rep. 309; and supra, this title, Origin and History of Interest.

Court Acting as Jury. — Whenever a jury might have allowed interest, the court, if substituted by consent for a jury, may allow interest. Marshall v. Dudley, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 244.

2. Interest by Contract Recoverable as of Right. — Redfield v. Ystalyfera Iron Co., 110 U. S. 174; Jourlmon v. Ewing, 80 Fed. Rep. 604; Lincoln v. Claflin, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 132; McIlvaine v. Wilkins, 12 N. H. 474; Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37; Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 635; Montgomery v. Boucher, 14 U. C. C. P. 45.

Interest by Contract Express or Implied. — Upon contracts in which an agreement to pay interest is expressed or can be implied, the interest is a legal incident, and it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury to give interest. Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 635. And see Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 62 Tex. 209.

Stated Exception to Rule. — With reference to the general rule that where interest has been contracted for it is recoverable as of right, and does not rest in the discretion of either the court or the jury the court said, in Jourlmon v. Ewing, 80 Fed. Rep. 604: "To this general rule there are also exceptions, though they are few in number, and rest upon very special reasons. Thus a court of equity, in suits for the specific performance of contracts, will sometimes grant such relief only upon condition of an abatement of interest where the peculiar facts are such as to make it equitable that that should be done. The relief is in the discretion of the court, and it may attach such a condition to granting it as, upon grounds broader than strict law, the equitable facts indicate as just."

3. Interest After Maturity of Contract. — Montgomery v. Boucher, 14 U. C. C. P. 45.

4. Implication of Contract Question for Jury. — Petre v. Duncombe, 15 Jur. 86, 20 L. J. Q. B. 242.

In an Action on a Receipt for a Stated Sum, containing a promise to remit the money received to a specified place, on which interest was claimed, it was held that it might or might not be allowed as the jury should determine from the facts and circumstances, and it was error to render a final judgment after default without the intervention of a jury. Williams v. Inman, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 267. See also for a very similar case Bell v. Logan, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 593.

5. Discretion of Jury to Allow or Disallow Interest as Damages — United States. — Redfield v. Ystalyfera Iron Co., 110 U. S. 174; Willings v. Consequa, Pet. (C. C.) 172.

Massachusetts. — Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 126.

Pennsylvania. — Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37.

Texas. — Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 635.

Circumstances Influencing Exercise of Discretion. — The plaintiff may have set his damages so inordinately high as to justify the defendant in refusing to pay, or in other ways the delay may be the plaintiff's fault; or the liability of the defendant may have arisen without fault on his part. In such cases the jury probably would not and certainly should not, make the allowance. Richards v. Citizens Natural Gas Co., 130 Pa. St. 37.

Plaintiff's Refusal to Accept Adequate Amount. — In an action of tort to property, the plaintiff will not, it has been held, be entitled to interest on his damages where it is shown that he re-trine cannot be recognized as a general rule at the present time.¹

b. DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT — (1) In General. — In the present state of the law it is impossible in this connection to announce a safe general rule or one which would be in any degree satisfactory.²

(2) Contracts to Pay Money — (a) Interest as of Right. — The weight of modern authority favors the recovery of interest as of right in all instances of the breach of a contract to pay a sum certain at a fixed time. Interest as damages in such cases is not within the discretion of the jury, but is recoverable as a measure of damages established and prescribed by law.³

(b) Interest in Discretion of Jury. — Where the amount due is controverted or unliquidated, or the time when it is payable is uncertain, not a few cases favor the rule of interest or no interest in the discretion of the jury.⁴

The English Rule seems to be, however, that interest, if given as damages, is fused before suit to accept damages for a sum larger than he was entitled to. Thompson v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 58 N. H. 524.

If a Plaintiff Has Been Prevented from Having His Damages Ascertained, and in that sense has been kept out of the sum that would have made him whole at the time, so long that such sum is no longer an indemnity, the jury, in its discretion and as incident to determining the amount of the original loss, may consider the delay caused by the defendant. And where this is done no better measure can be adopted than interest on the original damage. Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 126. See also Lincoln v. Clafin, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 132; Parks v. Boston, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 198, per Shaw, C. J.; Burt v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 115 Mass. 1; Old Colony R. Co. v. Miller, 125 Mass. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 194.

Where Interest Is Matter of Discretion with Jury or Referee, "the court will not interfere with the question, unless the discretion has been exercised in withholding it in a case in which it ought to have been allowed by fixed principles, or e converso, or the discretion has been grossly abused." Van Rensselaer v. Jones, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 670.

But where the jury has taken the difference between two sums as the measure of damages, if it distinctly appears that interest has been computed thereon for a greater length of time than the plaintiff has been deprived of it, a new trial will be granted, although the exact period for which interest should be allowed is not shown. Hetzel v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 6 Mackey (D. C.) 1.

1. See infra, the following subdivisions of this section.

2. Question of Law for Court. — It has been declared that in actions to recover damages for the breach of contracts, the question whether interest is recoverable does not rest in the discretion of the jury, but it is a question of law for the court. Mansfield v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 114 N. Y. 331.

Discretion of Court. — In Porter v. Barrow, 3 La. Ann. 140, it was said to be discretionary with the court to allow interest from judicial demand on damages for a breach of contract.

Discretion of Jury. — For the doctrine that interest on unliquidated damages for breach of contract is a question for the discretion of the jury, see Watkins v. Junker, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 38 S. W. Rep. 1129.

A Subscription for Stock in a Corporation to be paid for in instalments has been held not to be such a contract as authorizes the recovery of interest as a matter of right. Frank v. Morrison, 55 Md. 399.

Accounts. — Interest on a balance of account has been held discretionary with the jury. Killingly v. Taylor, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 99. See also Re Kirkpatrick, 10 Ont. Pr. 4, in which case it was held that the discretion under which a jury may allow interest on an account applies to the master's office.

Policies of Insurance. — The jury has a discretion to allow interest on the amount of a partial loss on a policy of insurance, if, under all the circumstances, it considers such allowance proper. Anonymous, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 315.

Receipt for Money. — As a matter of law, a receipt for money does not charge the receiptor with interest, but it is discretionary with the court or jury to allow it or disallow it. Bell v. Logan, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 593.

Where Payment for Work Has Been Long Delayed, it has been held that a jury might give interest from the expiration of a reasonable time, the jury, within the exercise of its discretion, to fix the time from which the interest should begin to run. Black v. Reybold, 3 Harl. (Del.) 528; Young v. Dickey, 63 Ind. 31; Rend v. Board, 75 Ind. 307; Wills v. Brown, 3 N. J. L. 136.

still in the discretion of the jury, although the amount and maturity of the debt are both certain and fixed and the debtor's default is established.¹

(3) Contracts to Do Something Other than Pay Money. — The doctrine of some authorities is that the recovery of interest as part of the damages for the breach of a contract for something other than the payment of money, such as the conveyance or delivery of property, etc., should be left to the discretion of the jury.² But in other such cases it has been held that interest is recoverable as matter of law, and the court may properly so instruct the jury;³ and in some of these instances the damages were neither liquidated in amount nor ascertainable by mere computation with reference to known and established values.⁴

c. DAMAGES FOR TORT — (1) In General. — The general rule has been said to be that interest in actions ex delicto is a matter for the discretion of the jury.⁵ But however this may have been formerly, there are many exceptions to the rule at the present time; so numerous are they, indeed, that it may

Where Delay Not Due to Debtor's Fault. — Where a creditor, with the view of a speedy payment, agreed to accept four per cent. interest, it was held that mere delay in the payment did not entitle him to charge five per cent., the evidence failing to show that the delay was attributable to misconduct on the part of the debtor. Scott v. Sandeman, 1 Macq. H. L. 293.

Interest After Maturity — Rate in Discretion of Jury. — In England the rule as to the rate of interest recoverable as damages after the maturity of a contract bearing interest at a conventional rate is that the trial tribunal should consider the position of the claimant and award to him such interest as damages, according to the conventional or legal rate, as under the circumstances may seem most just and equitable. Cook v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 27.

Mercantile Securities. — Even in the case of mercantile securities, where there is no express contract for it, interest has been regarded in England as damages within the discretion of the jury. Cameron v. Smith, 2 B. & Ald. 305; Dent v. Dunn, 3 Campb. 296; Ex p. Charman, W. N. (1887) 184; Brewerton v. Parker, 17 L. T. N. S. 325.

Rate — Conflict of Laws — Question for Court. — It has been held that the rate of interest to be adopted as the measure of damages in an action on a dishonored bill of exchange, as between the rate of the place of the drawer's residence and that of the drawee, is matter of law to be determined by the court. Gibbs v. Fremont, 9 Exch. 25.

Contract to Convey Lands. — Where a man contracted for the sale of lands, and it afterwards appeared that he had in truth no title to the lands when the contract was entered into, and in consequence of his want of title he refused to convey, it was held in an action founded on the covenant that whether interest should be allowed on the value of the lands was a question for the discretion of the jury, depending upon the circumstances of the case, of which the jury was the proper judge. Lecher v. Woodson, 1 Brock. (U. C.) 212.

Breach by Lessor of Contract to Repair. — In Hinkley v. Beckwith, 13 Wis. 34, which was a case for unliquidated damages against a lessor for the breach of a contract to repair, it was held to be within the discretion of the jury to allow interest on the damages assessed from the date of the expiration of the lease.

4. Contract to Furnish Cars for Shipment of Cattle. — In an action for breach of a contract to furnish cars for the shipment of cattle, it has been held proper for the court to instruct the jury to compute legal interest upon the amount of the damages found to the date of the loss. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 608.

Contract to Furnish Dredge Boats. — In reconviction of damages for the breach of a contract to furnish dredge boats, the trial court charged that interest was recoverable on such damages as the jury should find to have been suffered, and this was not held to have been error. Watkins v. Junker, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 38 S. W. Rep. 1129. No objection to the action of the court in this particular seems to have been taken. It was, however, objected on other grounds that interest was not recoverable.

well be doubted whether the proposition should be regarded as a general rule at all.¹

(2) Torts to Property — (a) Interest as of Right. — As the authorities seem first to have relaxed the early rule prohibitive of interest in cases involving unliquidated damages in actions of trover and conversion,² so such actions are believed to have been the first of their character in which interest was held recoverable as of right.³

Injuries to Real or Personal Property. — At the present time many cases hold that where there has been injury to real or personal property, interest is recoverable as of right as part of the compensation to which the injured party is entitled.⁴

(b) Interest in Discretion of Jury. — In many instances, however, interest has been held discretionary with the jury in actions for damages to property.⁵

(3) Torts to Person. — The subject of the discretion of the jury in actions

v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 462; Black v. Camden, etc., R., etc., Co., 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 40; Mansfield v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 114 N. Y. 336; Richmond v. Bronson, 5 Den. (N. Distinction Stated Between Contract and Tort. — There is, it has been held, "a well-settled distinction between actions resting on contract and those growing out of a tort, so far as interest is concerned. In the former interest is demandable as interest; in the latter it is not. In the former the court may properly direct its allowance; in the latter the question belongs to the jury. It may or it may not enter into their calculation of the damages. Whether it shall or not depends on the judgment of the jury in view of all the circumstances of the case." Reading, etc., R. Co. v. Balthaser, 126 Pa. St. 1.

2. Statute 3 & 4 William IV. — By the statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV., interest as part of the damages in actions of trover and trespass de bonis asportatis is not matter of right, but is in the discretion of the jury.

The Earlier Cases in New York followed the rule thus established in England and permitted the jury in its discretion to allow interest in such cases. O'Brien, J., in Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 104, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817. See Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 446, 5 Am. Dec. 348. See also supra, this title, Interest as Damages for Tort.

The Reason given for the rule allowing interest as a matter of right on the value of property converted or lost to the owner by a trespass is that interest is as necessary a part of the complete indemnity to the owner of the property as the value itself, and in fixing the damages is not any more in the discretion of the jury than such value. Wilson v. Troy, 135 N. Y. 103, 31 Am. St. Rep. 817. And see Andrews v. Durant, 18 N. Y. 496.

In Fraser v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 126, it was suggested that the reason for the allowance of interest on the damages in actions of trover and conversion is that the defendant may be presumed to have had the use of the goods since the conversion.

Rule Not Universal. — But the recovery of interest as of right in actions of trover and conversion and trespass is not a universal rule, even at the present time. See *Patapasco Guano Co. v. for damages for torts to the person has been practically disposed of by the statement in another place, with reference to such cases, that as a general rule interest is not allowed.¹

4. When Jury May Be Instructed to Give Interest. — From what has been said it follows as an obvious rule that when interest is recoverable of right it is proper to instruct the jury to give it,² and erroneous, in such circumstances, to refuse such an instruction.³

Where Interest Discretionary. — It is also clear that where interest is properly discretionary with the jury, it is error to direct either an award or a denial of it.⁴

But where the court improperly instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to damages by way of interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, and the jury found interest accordingly, and on appeal it was decided that, although the plaintiff was not entitled to damages as matter of law, yet the jury in such a case might in its discretion allow damages at that rate, and on inspection of the statement of facts the appellate court was satisfied that the jury ought, if the matter had been left to its discretion, to have allowed the same damages, the judgment was affirmed. Close v. Fields, 13 Tex. 623.

Doctrine of De Minimis. — Where the charge of the court as to interest was inaccurate in that the jurors were instructed to award to the plaintiff six per cent. interest on the value of the horse killed, if they found the defendant liable, whereas, according to the more approved rule, interest in such cases was in the discretion of the jury, it was held that as the verdict was small and the amount of the interest unimportant, the judgment would not be disturbed. Plymouth Tp. v. Graver, 125 Pa. St. 24, 11 Am. St. Rep. 867.

Where Interest Not Recoverable. — And the same may be said of an instruction to the jury that it may in its discretion give interest on the damages assessed in an action in which interest cannot under any circumstances be allowed,¹ or a refusal in such circumstances to instruct the jury not to give it.²

5. Rule under Particular Statutes. — In many jurisdictions the question of interest as of right or in the discretion of the jury has been made a subject of legislative enactment. Some illustrative examples of such statutes, as well as judicial constructions thereof, will be found in the notes below.³

Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay. — Under a statute providing for interest on money due and withheld by an unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment, whether there has been an unreasonable and vexatious delay is, in general, a question for the jury.⁴

1. Where Interest Irrecoverable. — Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 91 Tenn. 35. But where the court charged the jury that it might give interest or not as it chose, the judgment should not be reversed even if the charge was erroneous, unless the jury did give interest. Noe v. Hodges, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 103.

2. Where the Demand Was Unliquidated, it has been held error to refuse to instruct the jurors that interest was not recoverable thereon and to charge them that the subject of interest was a matter of their sound discretion. Murray v. Ware, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 325, 4 Am. Dec. 637.

But in an Action on an Account the jury may properly be instructed that, if it finds that the account was liquidated on a certain date, interest may be allowed from such date. Hartshorn v. Byrne, 147 Ill. 418.

3. Rule under Particular Statute — California. — The California statute provides that in an action for breach of an obligation not arising from contract, and in every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given in the discretion of the jury. King v. Southern Pac. Co., 109 Cal. 96; Civ. Code Cal., § 3288.

Georgia. — In Georgia it is provided that "in all cases where an amount ascertained would be the damages at the time of the breach, it may be increased by the addition of legal interest from that time till the recovery." This provision, it is held, applies in terms to an action for damages for the breach of a contract; but in cases arising ex delicto for the value of property destroyed, where the measure of damages is the value of the property, the same reasoning would apply the rule. Western, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 102 Ga. 13; 2 Code Ga. (1895), § 3800. And see Western, etc., R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818; Central R. Co. v. Sears, 66 Ga. 499; Georgia R., etc., Co. v. Crawley, 87 Ga. 192.

Mississippi — Debts Due by Account. — In Mississippi it has been held that open accounts do not bear interest as a matter of course, as an incident to the debt; but in such cases it is within the discretion of the jury to allow interest by way of damages for the detention of the debt. Houston v. Crutcher, 31 Miss. 51; Thompson v. Matthews, 56 Miss. 368.

Missouri. — In Missouri the statute provides that the jury on the trial of any issue or on any inquisition of damages "may, if they shall think fit, give damages in the nature of interest over and above the value of the goods at the time of the conversion or seizure," and under this statute it has been held discretionary with the jury as to whether interest will be allowed on the value of property converted. Rev. Stat. Mo. (1899), § 2869; Carson v. Smith, 133 Mo. 606; State v. Hope, 121 Mo. 34; Eagle Constr. Co. v. Wabash R. Co., 71 Mo. App. 626; State v. Hope, 121 Mo. 34.

New York. — In New York, under the statute in reference to compensation for causing death by negligence, which provides that the amount of damages recovered shall draw interest from the time of the death, "which interest shall be added to the verdict," the jury has nothing to do with the question of interest; that is to be added to the damages inserted in the entry of judgment by the clerk; and this although the jury, in making up damages awarded, in fact, included the interest. Manning v. Port Henry Iron Ore Co., 91 N. Y. 664; Laws N. Y. 1870, c. 78.

North Dakota. — In North Dakota it is provided that "in an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract and in every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given in the discretion of the jury." Under this section it was held to be error for the trial court to charge the jurors that they must allow to the plaintiff interest on the damages sustained in the destruction of property by fire. Johnson v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 1 N. Dak. 354; Ell v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 1 N. Dak. 336, 26 Am. St. Rep. 621; Rev. Codes N. Dak., § 4975.

South Dakota. — In this state the statute is identical with that of North Dakota quoted supra. It was held error, therefore, in an action for damages for the destruction of property by fire, for the court to direct the jury to assess interest on the amount of damages. Uhe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 3 S. Dak. 563, 4 S. Dak. 505; Comp. Laws Dak., § 4578.

4. Unreasonable and Vexatious Delay — Arkansas. — Watkins v. Wassell, 20 Ark. 410; Tatum v. Mohr, 21 Ark. 355.

Illinois. — Davis v. Kenaga, 51 Ill. 170; Devine v. Edwards, 101 Ill. 138; Levinson v. Sands, 74 Ill. App. 276. And see Kennedy v. Gibbs, 15 Ill. 406.

Indiana. — Rogers v. West, 9 Ind. 403.

Missouri. — McLean v. Thorp, 4 Mo. 256.

Error to Restrict Jury's Discretion. — Where the right to the recovery of interest is, under the statute, dependent upon whether there has been an unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment, it has been held error to instruct the jury that if they find certain facts to exist they may allow interest. For it is for the jury to say whether the particular facts constitute an unreasonable and vexatious delay in order to warrant the allowance of interest. Davis v. Kenaga, 51 Ill. 170.

INTEREST—INTERESTED. — Interest means concern; ¹ also, advantage; good; share; portion; part; participation; any right in the nature of property, but less than title. Its chief use seems to designate some right attaching to property which either cannot or need not be defined with precision.²

1. Fitch v. Bates, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 471.

2. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Clarke, 79 Tex. 24, quoting Abb. L. Dict.

Interest. — In Hoge v. Hollister, 2 Tenn. Ch. 609, the court quoted from Co. Litt. 345a, as follows: "Interest ex vi termini, in legal understanding, extendeth to estates, rights, and titles that a man hath of, in, to, or out of lands; for he is truly said to have an interest in them."

Insurance. (See also INSURABLE INTEREST, ante, p. 829, and the references there given.) — In a policy of insurance of personal property, the word interest is sometimes held to mean insurable interest. Graham v. American F. Ins. Co., 48 S. Car. 195.

Interest and Property Distinguished. — In Buck v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (U. S.) 162, it was said: "It is only necessary to inspect a few cases on this doctrine to be satisfied that the term interest, as used in application to the right to insure, does not necessarily imply property in the subject of insurance."

The term interest, however, is sometimes used to denote the property itself. Chester v. Painter, 2 P. Wms. 335; Pierce v. Pierce, 14 R. I. 517.

Interest and Title. — A policy provided that if the interest of the insured was or became "other than the entire, unconditional, unencumbered, and sole ownership of the property," the policy should be void. A short time before the fire the insured had made a contract agreeing to convey the property, but no deed had been made. Upon the question whether the policy was forfeited the court said: "It is a matter of nice discrimination to determine whether the word interest, as used in the condition, is synonymous with the word 'title,' or whether it means that and something besides. The authorities generally establish the rule that where the condition is against any change in the legal title, an executory contract of sale is not a violation of the condition; so that if the word interest as used in this proviso meant 'title,' there would be no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the policy was not forfeited." Arkansas F. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, (Ark. 1900) 55 S. W. Rep. 935. And in that case it was held that interest and "title" were not synonymous. See also Gibb v. Philadelphia F. Ins. Co., 59 Minn. 267; Germond v. Home Ins. Co., 2 Hun (N. Y.) 540.

In reply to a question, "What is your title to or interest in the property?" the applicant for fire insurance answered "Deed." It was held that this word did not import a fee. The court said: "We do not think that the single word 'deed' thus used must of necessity have that meaning alone. In the first place, the question put does not ask only as to the legal title. It is in the alternative, and asks as to the title or as to an interest. It imports a distinction of meaning in the two words. It plainly indicates that a title is something greater and more certain than an interest, as it sometimes is. A title is a lawful cause or ground for possessing that which is ours. Co. Litt. 345b, *155. An interest, though primarily it included the terms 'estate,' 'right and title' (Co. Litt. 345b, *155), has latterly come often to mean less, and to be the same as 'concern,' 'share,' and the like. Northampton v. Smith, 11 Met. (Mass.) 390. Clearly it meant less in this question in the application." Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 456. See also Loventhal v. Home Ins. Co., 112 Ala. 108; Hough v. City F. Ins. Co., 29 Conn. 10; Washington F. Ins. Co. v. Kelly, 32 Md. 451; Handover F. Ins. Co. v. Bohn, 48 Neb. 743; East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Crawford, (Tex. 1891) 16 S. W. Rep. 1068.

But in Gresham v. Johnson, 70 Ga. 633, it was said: "Wherever the title to the homestead is referred to as belonging to the beneficiaries, in any of the foregoing decisions, or in any of the cases which they cite, it will be evident that the word is not used in its literal and legal, but in a qualified or loose sense, as synonymous with interest."

Same—Assignment of Judgment. — A holder of a judgment assigned it in the following words: "We hereby sell and assign all our right, title, and interest in this judgment to M., without recourse on us." In construing this assignment in Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa 245, the court said: "The assignors transferred their 'right, title, and interest' in the judgment, 'without recourse.' The words used clearly indicate the absence of any intention to warrant the validity or value of the judgment or that it was collectible. The word 'title' relates to the assignors' ownership of the judgment—that is, by the use of the word they indicate the intention to transfer whatever property they may hold in it. The words 'right and interest' relate to the extent of that ownership or property. By the use of these words the assignors undertook to transfer whatever of value they owned or held in the judgment."

Interest and Estate Used Synonymously. — A deed contained the following words: "And it is further understood that I, S. H., hold a life interest in the above-described tract of land." S. H. was the grantor. In construing this deed the court said: "The word interest often is used to express or represent 'estate.' As, for instance, an interest in a tract of land is often used as meaning the same thing as an 'estate' in a tract of land. These two words are not unfrequently used as convertible terms. In the Code of Virginia of 1860, chapter one hundred and sixteen, sections two and five, and in the Code of 1868, chapter seventy-two, section eleven, the word interest is employed to represent 'estate' and as meaning the same thing. The word interest, as coupled with the word 'life,' in the deed from plaintiff to defendant, evidently means a life estate; and taking the whole sentence together, the 'life estate' means an estate for the life of the grantor." Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 397.

Reversions and Remainders.—A complaint that the complainants were "interested in the reversion" was held, upon general demurrer, a sufficient allegation that they were "entitled to the reversion." Peck v. Peck, 35 Conn. 390.

In Campbell v. Purdy, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 434, it was held that one entitled to the remainder after the life estate given by will was "a person interested in the estate" within Code Civ. Pro. N. Y., § 2727, permitting such person to apply to compel an executor to settle his accounts.

Leasehold.—In Chicago Attachment Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co., 142 Ill. 180, it was said: "The language of text books puts it beyond doubt that in legal contemplation a leasehold is 'an interest in or concerning lands.' Coke upon Littleton 345b; Williams on Personal Prop. (3d Am. and 5th Lond. ed.) 50, *2; 1 Washburn on Real Prop. (2d ed.) 9; Bishop on Contracts 1292; 3 AM. AND ENG. ENCYC. OF LAW (1st ed.) 164. And so we have expressly held, in suits between landlord and tenant, that this section includes leases of terms for more than a year. Lake v. Campbell, 18 Ill. 110; Strehl v. D'Evers, 66 Ill. 78; Creighton v. Sanders, 89 Ill. 543." This case was upon the construction of the statute of frauds. See also Briles v. Pace, 13 Ired. L. (J. Car.) 279; and see generally the title STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

A Virginia statute provided that any interest or claim to real estate might be disposed of by deed or will. It was held that the contingent remainder was an interest or claim to real estate. Young v. Young, 89 Va. 675. See also Nutter v. Russell, 3 Met. (Ky.) 163; Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 674.

"The word interest embraces the estate of a lessee, which is quite commonly denominated a leasehold interest." Sanford v. Johnson, 24 Minn. 173.

A quarterly tenant under notice to quit has been held to have no interest in the land. Syers v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 36 L. T. N. S. 277.

In Jervis v. Lawrence, 22 Ch. D. 215, Bacon, V. C., said: "A man who has a power of distress has no interest in the land. A landlord or lessor while the lease subsists has no present interest in the land."

Mortgage or Judgment Lien.—It has been said that a mortgage or judgment lien is no interest, estate, or title in the property itself. Independent School Dist. v. Werner, 43 Iowa 613; Daniels v. Densmore, 32 Neb. 40; Rodgers v. Bonner, 45 N. Y. 379.

Where an act provides for reasonable notice to "owners or parties interested" of the sale of property for taxes, a tax deed is not rendered invalid by failure to serve the notice upon a mortgagee, although his mortgage appears on record unsatisfied at the time specified for giving notice. Smyth v. Neff, 123 Ill. 310.

But in Ormsby v. Ottman, 85 Fed. Rep. 497, it was said: "On the other hand, the word interest is the broadest term applicable to claims in or upon real estate. In its ordinary significance among men of all classes it is broad enough to include any right, title, or estate in, or lien upon, real estate. One who holds a mortgage upon a piece of land for half its value is commonly and truthfully said to be interested, to have an interest in it, and it would not be true, in the common understanding of men, to say that he had no interest in it." This was upon the construction of a statute empowering a person claiming title to real estate to maintain a suit to quiet his title against any person who claimed an adverse estate or interest therein. See also In re Watts, 55 L. J. Ch. 332.

A mortgagee out of possession, whose mortgage is recorded, should be made a party to proceedings instituted before county commissioners to ascertain the damages of landowners for land taken for a railroad. He comes within the description of "persons having any interest in land." Wilson v. European, etc., R. Co., 67 Me. 358. And see Michigan Air Line R. Co. v. Barnes, 40 Mich. 383.

A mortgage upon the property insured is a conveyance of an interest therein such as to avoid a policy which by its terms was to become void upon any conveyance of an interest in the property by the insured without the consent of the insurer. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Clarke, 79 Tex. 23.

In Miller v. Collins, (1896) 1 Ch. 573, it was held that a married woman's equitable reversionary life interest in a sum of money, properly invested by her trustee upon a mortgage of land, was an interest in land so that she could dispose thereof by deed acknowledged and with the husband's concurrence.

Lien.—A Dakota statute provided for an action to determine adverse estates and interests in real property. In Power v. Bowdle, 3 N. Dak. 107, it was held that a mere lien was not primarily within the purview of the statute. See also Bidwell v. Webb, 10 Minn. 59. But compare Brackett v. Gilmore, 15 Minn. 245; Donohue v. Ladd, 31 Minn. 244.

Right of Way.—The term "interest in land" has been held to include a right of way. Parks, etc., Com'rs v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 90 Mich. 385. See also State v. Easton, etc., R. Co., 36 N. J. L. 181.

Fee.—It has been held that a devise of all the testator's interest in the estate will pass the fee if he holds it. Andrew v. Southouse, 5 T. R. 292; Doe v. Allen, 8 T. R. 502.

A Deed of all the interest of a grantor in land conveys the same title as a deed of the land. Dow v. Whitney, 147 Mass. 1.

Right of Shooting.—In Webber v. Lee, 9 Q. B. D. 315, a right to shoot over land was held to be an interest in the land within the statute of frauds. But compare Bird v. Great Eastern R. Co., 19 C. B. N. S. 268, 115 E. C. L. 268.

Conveyances.—The provision of the Land Titles Act, Rev. Stat. Ont., c. 116, § 61, permitting registration of cautions against registered dealings with lands, applies to "any person interested in any way" in the lands. It was held that, as the Land Titles Act relates mainly to conveyancing, whatever dealing gives a valid claim to call for or receive a conveyance of land is an interest within the scope of the statute; and an appointee or nominee in writing of the purchaser of an interest in lands has a locus standi as cautioner; and where such an appointee registered a caution as "owner," and there was no doubt of the substantial nature of his claim, his caution was supportable as against any objection in point of form by virtue of section 131 of the statute. Re Clagstone, 28 Ont. 409.

Shares of Stock.—In Bradley v. Holdsworth, 3 M. & W. 422, it was held that shares of stock in a railroad company were not interests in land, within the statute of frauds. See also Duncuft v. Albrecht, 12 Sim. 189; and see the title STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Bonds.—It has been held that a railway debenture was not an interest in land. Attree v. Hawe, 9 Ch. D. 337. So in In re Harris, 15 Ch. D. 561, it was held that bonds charged on police rates were not interests in the land.

Equitable Interest.—"An equitable interest is one that can be made available, effective, or sustained in a court of equity." Connell v. Galligher, 36 Neb. 754.

For a holding that equitable interest is included in the term "interest in land," see Martin v. London, etc., R. Co., L. R. 1 Ch. 501.

Patent Interests. (See also the title PATENTS.)—Under the provision of the patent act of 1836 enacting that damages may be recovered by an action brought in the name of the person interested, the original owner of the patent who has afterwards sold his right may recover for an infringement committed during the time when he was owner. The word interested means interested in the patent at the time when the infringement was committed. Moore v. Marsh, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 515.

All Who May Feel Interested.—A common carrier engaged in carrying the United States mail and also in the transportation of passengers wrote a letter to a postmaster at one of the offices from which he was accustomed to carry the mail, informing him that on a certain day one of his vessels, which did not ordinarily stop, would stop there, and also requesting him to have a mail in readiness and to "advise all who may feel interested in the above." It was held that the expression "all who may feel interested" did not refer alone to persons interested in the mail, but, under the circumstances, included also those who wished to take passage on the vessel; and, further, that it was competent to introduce parol evidence of the circumstances under which the letter was written, and of the nature of the business in which the common carrier was engaged, in explanation of the phrase: "all who may feel interested," in order to show that passengers were embraced in it. Heirn v. McCaughan, 32 Miss. 19.

Pecuniary Interest.—A statute provided that no member of the council should be directly or indirectly interested in the profits of any contract of the corporation. In construing this statute in Smedley v. Kirby, (Mich. 1899) 79 N. W. Rep. 188, the court said: "This indicates that a pecuniary interest was intended. Anderson defines interest as 'such relation to the matter in issue as creates a liability to pecuniary loss or gain from the event of a suit.'" Citing 11 AM. AND ENG. ENCYC. OF LAW 422; Taylor v. Highway Com'rs, 88 Ill. 527. See also Northampton v. Smith, 11 Met. (Mass.) 395; and see the title MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

A member of a city council who is also a salaried employee of a firm of contractors has not an interest in his employer's contracts. The court said that "the word interested does not mean anything but pecuniary interest, and of this there is no evidence." Dunlap v. Philadelphia, 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 98.

A statute provided that a judge should be disqualified in acting in any case in which he was interested. In construing this statute the court said: "But the word interested, found in this section of the statute, probably means pecuniarily interested, or at least it means that a judge, to be disqualified from hearing a case, must be in such a situation with reference to it or the parties that he will gain or lose something by the result of the action on trial." Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Kellogg, 54 Neb. 138.

State—Quo Warranto.—The state is not "interested as a party or otherwise" in a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto to try the title of a person to an office into which it is alleged he has intruded, in such sense as to give to the Supreme Court jurisdiction to hear an appeal. The interest which a state must have in such a cause is a substantial interest, as a monetary interest. McGrath v. People, 100 Ill. 464.

Owner and Person Interested. (See also OWNER.)—In State v. Easton, etc., R. Co., 36 N. J. L. 184, it was said: "The charter plainly distinguishes between the owner and persons interested, throughout the entire proceedings for condemnation as provided for in the seventh and eighth sections. By owner is meant the person having some legal estate which the company proposes by the condemnation to acquire. Under the more comprehensive expression of 'persons interested' are included not only the person in whom is vested the legal title which the company proposes to acquire, as indicated by their application, but also other individuals having some independent right or interest therein not amounting to an actual legal estate, such as an easement of a right of way, inchoate rights of dower or curtesy, or incumbrances, such as by judgments or mortgages, which are charges or liens on the legal estate. The object attained in making the latter class of individuals parties to the proceedings is that their interests may be extinguished by payment out of the money awarded or compensated for under the provisions of the general statute, which authorizes the court into which the money may be paid to make allowance out of the fund in satisfaction of such interest."

Trade.—In decreeing damages as compensation for the construction of a railway it was held that the trade carried on in particular premises was a thing appertaining to the premises, and as such was included in the interest of the occupier, for which compensation was to be given; and also that the meaning of "persons interested" was retaining a special and individual loss by reason of the works which the company had constructed. Rickett v. Metropolitan R. Co., L. R. 2 H. L. 175.

Witnesses.—In Chicago City R. Co. v. Mager, 185 Ill. 236, it was said: "Mr. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence (vol. 1, § 386), defines an interest in the result of a suit to be 'some legal, certain, and immediate interest, however minute, either in the event of the cause itself or in the record, as an instrument of evidence, in support of his own claims, in a subsequent action. It must be a legal interest, as distinguished from the prejudice or bias resulting from friendship or hatred, or from consanguinity, or any other domestic or social or any official relation, or any other motives by which men are generally influenced; for these go only to the credibility." "

See also the title WITNESSES.

Subscribing Witness. (See also the title WILLS.)

—In Stephenson v. Stephenson, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 529, it was held that the father of a beneficiary under a will was not an interested party, and was competent, as a subscribing witness, to testify as to transactions with the decedent.

A Magistrate who was a law partner of the defendant's counsel and himself counsel for the defendant in another case was held to be a "person interested" and unable to take a deposition. Dodd v. Northrop, 37 Conn. 216.

Judge. (See also the title JUDGES.)—"The interest which will disqualify a judge must be direct and immediate, and not remote and contingent. * * * Any other construction would be harsh, constrained, and technical, and would, without any just reason, merely throw impediments in the way of suits and unnecessarily embarrass the administration of justice." Peck v. Freeholders of Essex, 20 N. J. L. 466, quoted in Ellis v. Smith, 42 Ala. 353.

A probate judge who has a power of attorney from any of the persons claiming to be heirs of the deceased, authorizing him to receive for them any money or property to which they might be entitled from the estate, and also letters offering him a percentage upon profits coming to the alleged heir, is interested in the estate and cannot act as judge in any matter pertaining thereto. Matter of White, 37 Cal. 190.

In Sauls v. Freeman, 24 Fla. 209, it was held that the interest which disqualifies a judge from sitting in a cause is a property interest in the action or in its result. The interest which he may have in common with other citizens in a public matter does not disqualify him. See also Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Kellogg, 54 Neb. 138.

In Austin v. Nalle, 85 Tex. 520, it was held that a judge who owned taxable property in a city was interested in a suit against such city to cancel bonds issued by it.

A Sheriff is not so interested in an action of replevin brought against his deputy for property attached by him as to authorize a coroner to serve the writ. Browning v. Bancroft, 5 Met. (Mass.) 88.

Nor will the owning of stock in a corporation by a sheriff disqualify him as interested from executing process in a case where the corporation is a party. Hardwick v. Jones, 65 Mo. 54.

Equalization of Taxes. (See also the title TAXATION.)—Any person who has property listed on the assessment roll of a county for taxation is interested in the proceedings of the county board of equalization in the sense of a statute giving to him a right to appear before such board and have redress against an unjust valuation. Dundee Mortg. Trust Invest. Co. v. Charlton, 32 Fed. Rep. 192.

A taxpayer is a "party beneficially interested" in having all the property in the district assessed, and is a proper party to make affidavit for the issue of the writ of mandamus to the assessor. Hyatt v. Allen, 54 Cal. 353.

Assignments for Benefit of Creditors—Secured Creditors.—A statute provided that the court might remove a voluntary assignee for the benefit of creditors, upon petition for cause shown, where the application for his removal was made by a majority in interest of the creditors interested in the assignment. It was held that in ascertaining such majority, lien creditors and mortgagees who were fully secured outside of the assignment were not to be reckoned as interested. Matter of Durfee, 4 R. I. 401. See also the title ASSIGNMENTS FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS, vol. 3, p. 1.

Intervention. (See also the title INTERVENTION, II ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 494.)—By a South Dakota statute any person who had an interest in the matter in litigation might intervene. It was held that this did not include a simple judgment creditor. The court held that an interest must be that created by a claim to the demand or some part thereof, or a claim to a lien upon the property or some part thereof which was the subject-matter of the litigation. Yetter v. Young, 3 S. Dak. 263.

An attachment statute provided that any person interested might file his petition at any time before the sale of the property attached as the estate of the defendant. It was held that a mere creditor, who had no specific lien upon the property attached, was not a person interested within the meaning of the statute. Crim v. Harmon, 38 W. Va. 596.

A Louisiana statute provided that in order to be entitled to intervene it should be "enough to have an interest in the success of either of the parties to the suit." In Gasquet v. Johnson, 1 La. 431, it was said: "This, we suppose, must be a direct interest by which the intervening party is to obtain immediate gain, or suffer loss, by the judgment which may be rendered between the original parties." See also Brown v. Saul, 4 Mart. N. S. (La.) 434.

In Horn v. Volcano Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, it was held that an interest which entitles a person to intervene in a suit must be in the matter in litigation, and of such a direct and immediate character that the intervener will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of judgment.

Party Really Interested.—The meaning of the words "the party really interested" in moneys for which an action is brought was held to be certainly determined by no fixed rule. Whether a party has or has not the legal title, if he is the party to whom payment can legally be made, and who can legally discharge the debtor, the action may be brought in his name, although the money, when collected, is not for his use, but for that of some other persons, to whose use he is required to apply it, or to whom he is bound to pay it. Yerby v. Sexton, 48 Ala. 311.

Trusts. (See also the title TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES.)—The executor of a will who was a codeviser and legatee with two trustees was held not a person interested in proceedings regarding the trust. Greene v. Borland, 4 Met. (Mass.) 330.

The beneficiary in a deed of trust of personal property is a party in interest, and may file his claim with the sheriff. State v. McKellop, 40 Mo. 184.

The trustees of a burial society who, by its constitution, could not be members, were held to be persons interested, so as to be able to institute proceedings against the society. Hull v. M'Farlane, 2 C. B. N. S. 796, 89 E. C. L. 796.

Same — Vested Interest. — A Massachusetts statute provided that a trustee of an estate might be excused from giving sureties on his bond upon the petitions of all persons beneficially interested in the estate. It was held that persons interested, in this sense, referred only to such persons interested as had present vested interests in the estate, and not to such as were not in being nor to such as might become interested in the future. Dexter v. Cotting, 149 Mass. 92.

Vested Interest. — As to interest in the sense of "vested interest" see Northampton v. Smith, 11 Met. (Mass.) 395.

Bankrupt. (See also the title INSOLVENCY AND BANKRUPTCY, ante, p. 630.) — A bankrupt out of whose estate a bill of costs is paid by the trustee in bankruptcy is not a "party interested" in the property out of which the bill is paid, so as to be able to make application to refer the bill to be taxed, even though ultimately the creditors are paid in full and there is a surplus. In re Leadbitter, 27 W. R. 267.

Same — United States Courts. — An Act of Congress provided that the Circuit Court should have "concurrent jurisdiction with the District Courts of the same district, of all suits at law or in equity which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee," touching any property of the bankrupt. In construing this statute in Bachman v. Packard, 2 Sawy. (U. S.) 264, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 709, the court said: "The term interest, as used in the act, signifies an estate, share, or part, and a suit to be maintained in the Circuit Court by or against an assignee must be concerning some property or right of property derived from the bankrupt, and in which it must appear that one party or the other claims an interest adversely to, that is, against, the other." See also Goodall v. Tuttle, 3 Biss. (U. S.) 219, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,533.

Restraint of Trade. — The addition of the words "be concerned in" or "interested in," in addition to a promise not to "carry on" or "engage in" a business, shows that the parties intend to extend the contract further than the latter terms alone would do. Nelson v. Johnson, 38 Minn. 255. See also the title RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Highways. — A statute provided that upon an affidavit by a party beneficially interested, a writ of review to an order of a board of supervisors granting the right to use a highway for the purpose of a railroad might issue. It was held that the affidavit was insufficient where it merely stated that the affiant, in common with others living along the highway, would be damaged. The court said: "It does not appear that the application for the writ was made on the affidavit of the party beneficially interested. The code requires that 'the application must be made on affidavit by the person beneficially interested.' Code Civ. Pro., § 1069. It does not appear by the petition in this case that the petitioner has any other or greater right in the public highway mentioned therein than any other citizen of the state. The requirement that the application must be made by 'the party beneficially interested' has been construed to mean 'that in an application made by a private party, his interest must be of a nature which is distinguishable from that of the mass of the community.' Linden v. Alameda County, 45 Cal. 7." Ashe v. Colusa County, 71 Cal. 236.

No person has the right to appeal as a person interested from the decision of commissioners of highways in laying out a new road or vacating an old one, unless he is the owner of land adjoining the road to be laid out or vacated. Taylor v. Highway Com'rs, 88 Ill. 527. The court said: "The word interested must receive a reasonable construction, such as will, on the one hand, protect those who have a direct and substantial interest in the matter, and, on the other hand, protect the commissioners of highways from unnecessary litigation in defending their action as such at the suit of persons who may imagine they have an interest, when in fact they have no such interest as was contemplated by the legislature. Every citizen of a county, in one sense, has an interest in the public highways. So, too, it may be said, and properly, that every citizen of the state has an interest in the highways in the different counties of the state. If, therefore, the language of the statute is to be interpreted literally, an appeal might be taken by any citizen of the state. But we apprehend it was not the intention of the legislature that the word interested should receive such a liberal construction. It was doubtless intended to give the right of appeal to those persons who had a direct and pecuniary interest not shared by the public at large, such as owned land adjoining the new road laid out or the old one vacated."

In Whitmer v. Highway Com'rs, 96 Ill. 289, in commenting on the use of the words "land adjoining the new road," etc., in the above case, it was said: "If that is to be taken in the strict meaning of touching the land, so that no person can appeal from such an order unless he is the owner of land which is actually touched by the road to be laid out or vacated, we are satisfied that the construction there adopted was a too narrow one." See also Brown v. Roberts, 23 Ill. App. 461.

"Those interested therein," who by statute are entitled to notice of the meetings of a committee to whom an application for a highway has been referred, include "all who may be affected by the contemplated highway and all whose interests may be adverse to those of the town on the question of damages." Shelton v. Derby, 27 Conn. 421. See also the title HIGHWAYS, vol. 15, p. 343.

Interest in Shares of Stock. — The defendant, being possessed of certain shares of stock, transferred them as security for a debt. Subsequently he assigned them, subject to the INTEREST POLICY.—An interest policy is one which shows by its form that the assured has a real, substantial interest; in other words, that the contract of insurance embodied by the policy is a contract of indemnity, and not a wager.¹

INTERFERE.—To intervene, so as to cut off, intercept, or interrupt;² to debt, to trustees upon trust to repay a loan which had been made to him by his brother, and to apply the surplus for the benefit, at the trustees' discretion, of his wife, his children, or himself. It was held that he still had an interest in the shares. Cragg v. Taylor, L. R. 2 Exch. 131. See also Atty.-Gen. v. Heywood, 19 Q. B. D. 331.

Contest of Will.—A person who does not take under a will is not interested in it within the meaning of Code Civ. Pro. N. Y., § 2653a, and therefore, although a child of the testatrix, cannot maintain an action under that section to determine the validity of her will devising and bequeathing all her estate to the defendant in such action. Whitney v. Britton, 16 N. Y. App. Div. 457.

Interests under Will.—A testator devised certain real property to his wife and also gave to her a legacy of one hundred thousand dollars. The personal property of the testator consisted principally of ships and vessels. The testator directed that his executors should not be compelled to sell his ships, etc., or to pay the legacies, until in their judgment the best interests of the estate would be promoted by so doing, and that his wife should draw from the earnings of the ships the share which her interests under the will should bear to the whole net earnings. It was held that the use of the word interests did not authorize an inference that the testator intended his widow to have another interest in addition to the legacy, i. e. a share in the residuary estate. Luce v. Dunham, 69 N. Y. 37.

Legatee.—In Brigham v. Gott, (Supm. Ct. Gen. T.) 3 N. Y. Supp. 518, it was held that a legatee was a person interested in the event, within a statute providing that such person should not be examined against "a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person," where it appeared that there was not sufficient property to pay the debts of the deceased.

Interested in a Bargain or Contract.—An officer of a local board who is a shareholder in a company having a contract with the board is, so long as the contract exists, interested in a bargain or contract with the board within the meaning of the English Public Health Act, 1875, § 193, and if the contract is capable of producing any profit to the shareholders of the company, he is liable to the penalty imposed by that enactment. Todd v. Robinson, 14 Q. B. D. 739. So in Hunnings v. Williamson, 11 Q. B. D. 536, it was said: "A third objection urged was that there was no sufficient evidence that the defendant was interested in a contract made with the vestry. Under section 54, in order to render the defendant liable, he must have been 'concerned or interested in' some 'contract or work made with or executed for such * * * vestry.' In the present case we have to consider whether the defendant was interested in a contract within the meaning of section 54. It has been contended that as the defendant merely lent money to his brother in order to enable him to carry out the contract, and merely took an assignment of it by way of security for repayment of his loan, he was not interested in the contract, but surely it was much to the defendant's interest to promote the fulfilment of the contract, in order that he might obtain repayment of the money which he had advanced. I think that the defendant was interested in the contract within the meaning of section 54."

Where by the terms of contracts entered into with a local authority, the surveyor to the local authority was to receive from the contractors, in respect of bills of quantities to be prepared by him, percentages on the amounts he should certify to be due to such contractors, it was held that in respect of each contract the surveyor was liable to a penalty as being "concerned or interested" therein. Whitley v. Barley, 21 Q. B. D. 154, 57 L. J. Q. B. 643. Lindley, L. J., said: "This is not a question of exacting or accepting any fee or reward, but of being 'interested in a contract,' and if a man is entitled to be paid an amount which varies with the contract price, it appears to me utterly immaterial to consider who his paymaster is. He becomes immediately interested in the contract, and he is a person hit at by this section." See also Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal, 3 H. L. Cas. 759; Burgess v. Clark, 14 Q. B. D. 735.

2. Interfere.—Thus it has been held (Cockburn, C. J., dissenting) that the provision of the English Metropolitan Sewers Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict., c. 112, § 50, that "where any work by the commissioners done or required to be done in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall interfere with or prejudicially affect any ancient mill, or any right connected therewith, or other right to the use of water, full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining damage thereby," did not apply to cases in which the effect of the sewer was only to intercept underground springs which would otherwise have risen into a pond, even though the pond thereby became dry. Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 3 B. & S. 710, 113 E. C. L. 710. See also Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 340.

To Interfere with or Affect Any Settlement.—The English Married Women's Property Act provided that it should not interfere with or affect any settlement. In construing this case come into collision; to clash; to be in opposition.¹

the court in In re Onslow, 39 Ch. Div. 625, said: "In In re Armstrong, 21 Q. B. D. 264. Lord Justice Lindley said that the words 'interfere with or affect any settlement' meant 'invalidate or render inoperative any settlement;' and he observes that the legislature draws a distinction between interfering with a settlement and affecting an estate created by the settlement. Lord Justice Lopes concurred in this view. The Master of the Rolls dissented." The court adopted the distinction of Lord Justice Lindley.

Abolition of Office. (See generally the titles JUDGE; PUBLIC OFFICERS.)—The provision of the Constitution of Arkansas, art. 7, § 5, that "the General Assembly shall not interfere with the term of office of any judge," does not deprive the legislature of the power to abolish the office, and thereby put an end to the term. Van Buren County v. Mattox, 30 Ark. 567.

1. Molestation or Interference.—A, a trader, entered into an agreement with his creditors, by deed, by which he was to have license to carry on his business for five years under supervision, and it was provided therein that if any creditor so covenanting should, during the continuance of the license, molest or interfere with A, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the indenture, A should thereupon be exonerated and relieved from all debts and demands of such creditor by whom the letter of license should be so contravened. A creditor, party to the deed, brought suit against A within the five years, and it was held that this was a "molestation or interference" with A, within the meaning of the proviso, and might be pleaded in bar as such; Wilde, C. J., saying: "It is said that that which has occurred here is not a molestation within the meaning of the deed. Looking at all the circumstances, it is impossible to doubt that suing the debtor was the very species of molestation which the parties sought to guard against, and no other. They clearly could not have had anything else in their contemplation. When, therefore, this action—which in the ordinary course would go on to judgment and execution—was brought, the defendant had a right to assume that it was brought for the purpose of molesting or interfering with him, and so preventing him from carrying into effect the contract he had entered into. In the absence, therefore, of anything to control it, it seems to me that the parties contemplated a molestation by suing out a writ." Gibbons v. Voulton, 8 C. B. 483, 65 E. C. L. 483.

Libel.—The secretary of the interior sent out circular letters stating that any interference on the part of W. R. L. (plaintiff), a former chief of the stationery and printing division, with the business of the department in any way, would not be to the interest of any firm represented. The plaintiff was then in the business of government contractor. Upon the question whether this letter was libelous, the court said: "As the complaint alleges, it may be read as intending to state that the plaintiff's services would be of no value to persons proposing to employ him. It is capable of a much more vicious meaning. In the light of the circumstances under which it was sent it may be read not only as an imputation of the plaintiff's incompetency as a broker, but also as an intimation that his employment would be regarded by the department of the interior as an intermeddling and an officious interference therewith. One meaning of interference is 'intermeddling.' The circular implies quite definitely that persons having business to do with the department will consult their interests by not employing the plaintiff." Lapham v. Noble, 54 Fed. Rep. 109.

Interfere—Patent. (See also the title PATENTS.)—In Lowrey v. Cowles Electric Smelting, etc., Co., 68 Fed. Rep. 372, it was said: "The words 'do or may interfere' are plainly to be construed with reference to the atmosphere in which the parties then were. They were in the atmosphere of the patent office. They were considering the question of applications, caveats, and patents—all technical terms to describe different steps in the securing of a monopoly by government grant. The word interfere has a technical meaning in that connection. It is used in the statutes of the United States. Strictly speaking, an interference is declared to exist by the patent office whenever it is decided by the properly constituted authority in that bureau that two pending applications, or that a patent and a pending application, in their claims or essence cover the same discovery or invention, so as to require an investigation into the question of the priority of invention between the two applications or the application and the patent." I. INTRODUCTORY — Precedents on Which Grounded. — The idea of interference with contract relations as a specific tort is of recent origin. The materials from which the generalization was worked out are found in several lines of precedents. From an early day it has been established that a master may maintain an action against one who entices away his servant or harbors and detains him with knowledge of his former contract.¹ The action of slander of title often involves an interference with contract relations either perfect or inchoate.² Lord Holt's assertion of the existence of a common-law right to carry on a trade or earn a livelihood without hindrance or disturbance, after

1. Enticement of Servants Actionable. — Brooke's Abr., tit. Laborers, pl. 21; F. N. B. 167; Adams v. Pafield, Leon. 240; Hambleton v. Veere, 2 Saund. 169; Reg. v. Daniell, 6 Mod. 99, 182, 1 Salk. 380; Reg. v. Callingwood, 2 Ld. Raym. 1116; Hart v. Aldridge, 1 Cowp. 54, 10ff. 493; Blake v. Lanyon, 6 T. R. 221; Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216, Big. Cas. Torts 306; Evans v. Walton, L. R. 2 C. P. 615.

It was generally assumed, on the strength of the older authorities cited above, that the action for enticing servants was a common-law action, until the elaborate judgment of Coleridge, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216. Thus it is laid down in Brooke's Abridgment, ubi supra, that "in trespass it was agreed that, at common law, if a man had taken my servant from me, trespass lay vi et armis; but if he had procured the servant to depart and he retained him, action lay not at common law vi et armis, but it lay upon the case upon the departure by procurement." Sir John Taylor Coleridge, in the judgment referred to, sought to prove from an elaborate examination of the Year Books and older cases that the action for enticement was a statutory action founded on the statute of laborers, A. D. 1350, and that the generally received view rested on Brooke's misconception of the case, Year Book Mich., 11 Henry IV., fol. 23a, pl. 46. This view is reaffirmed by Coleridge, C. J. (John Duke), in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 341, and by Prof. Wigmore upon a thorough review of the cases from the Year Books in an article in 21 Am. L. Rev. 764, and seems now to be generally accepted. It is, however, combated in Smith on Master and Servant (4th ed.) 157, note. See also Big. Cas. Torts 325. Mr. Smith only shows that the misconception has become an integral part of the law in certain classes of cases.

2. Slander of Title. — In this form of action, "more especially where the property is realty, the damage is usually the loss of the benefit under a particular contract which is thrown up in consequence of the false statement, which contract must of course be proved. The nature of the injury is therefore very analogous to * * * interference with contractual rights." Piggott on Torts 377. See as an illustration Green v. Button, 2 C. M. & R. 707. See also the New York cases, Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 20 Am. Dec. 623; Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 22, 23 Am. Rep. 30, which are considered to belong under this head in Pollock on Torts (1st ed.) 261.

lying unnoticed for more than a century and a half has been brought into much prominence in this connection in recent years.¹ Lastly, the old generalization that the concurrence of damage and injury or of damage and fraud gives an action, however new to the courts in the particular instance in which the concurrence is found, has, of course, played a part in the development of the doctrine.²

Lumley v. Gye. — But the real history of the idea that interference with contract relations is an actionable tort is found in the case of Lumley v. Gye, decided in the English Court of Queen's Bench in 1853.³ In this case Miss Wagner, a dramatic artist, had contracted with the plaintiff to sing at his theatre, and not elsewhere, during a certain time. The defendant persuaded her to break the contract. It was held that an action was maintainable at the common law against the defendant for procuring Miss Wagner to break her contract. Coleridge, J., dissented, maintaining that the action for enticing servants originated in the statute of laborers, was applicable only where the employee was strictly a servant, and did not reach the case of a theatrical performer. Crompton, J., thought the old remedy for enticement was applicable in "all cases where there is an unlawful and malicious enticing away of any person employed to give his personal labor or service for a given time, under the direction of a master or employer who is injured by the wrongful act," but he limited his decision to the case of a valid contract for exclusive personal services for a specified period. Erle, J., took a still broader view. He declared that the enticement precedents rested upon the principle that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all instances where the violation is an actionable wrong, and appeared to regard the principle as applicable to contracts generally.⁴

II. INDUCING BREACH OF EXISTING CONTRACT — 1. General Statement. — The fully developed doctrine has been thus stated: "If one maliciously interferes in a contract between two parties, and induces one of them to break that con-

1. Right to Pursue Livelihood Unmolested. — Keeble v. Hickeringill, decided in 1706, best reported in 11 East 574, note. These expressions of Lord Holt in this case have especially been relied on: "He that hinders another in his trade or livelihood is liable to an action for so hindering him." "Where a violent or malicious act is done to a man's occupation, profession, or way of getting a livelihood, there an action lies in all cases." The authority of this case is exhaustively discussed in Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 1, and from that case Sir Frederick Pollock concludes: "There is no better or higher right to carry on one's business than to do any other lawful act." 14 Law Quart. Rev. 131

The developed doctrine was thus expressed in Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 564, by Wells, J.: "Every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition; but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition, or the exercise of like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria, unless some superior right by contract or otherwise is interfered with. But if it come from the merely wanton or malicious acts of others, without the justification of competition or the service of any interest or any lawful purpose, it then stands upon a different footing." See also Barr v. Essex Trades Council, 53 N. J. Eq.

101; and generally the title LABOR COMBINATIONS.

2. Concurrence of Damage and Injury or Fraud. — See the famous cases of Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 264; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, Big. Cas. Torts 1.

In Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 337, Brett, L. J., thus stated the principle of Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216: "Wherever a man does an act which in law and in fact is a wrongful act, and such an act as may, as a natural and probable consequence of it, produce injury to another, and which in the particular case does produce such an injury, an action on the case will lie. This is the proposition to be deduced from the case of Ashby v. White, 1 Smith Lead. Cas. 264."

3. Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216, 22 L. J. Q. B. 463, 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 168, 17 Jur. 827, Big. Cas. Torts 306.

4. "Where a right to the performance of a contract has been violated by a breach thereof, the remedy is upon the contract against the contracting party; and if he is made to indemnify for such breach, no further recourse is allowed; and as in case of the procurement of a breach of contract the action is for a wrong and cannot be joined with the action on the contract, and as the act itself is not likely to be of frequent occurrence nor easy of proof, therefore the actions for this wrong, in respect of other contracts than those of hiring, are not numerous." Erle, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 232, 75 E. C. L. 232.

tract, to the injury of the other, the party injured can maintain an action against the wrongdoer."¹

2. The Contract Broken — Nature of Contract. — It has been seen that the early common law gave a remedy for interference with contract relations only when the contract was one between master and servant,² and this view is still maintained with vigor in some American jurisdictions.³ In Lumley v. Gye malicious interference, i. e., interference with notice, with any contract for exclusive personal service, was regarded as giving rise to a cause of action.⁴ And where malice (in the sense of an indirect motive, as hereinafter explained) is present, in some jurisdictions the action for inducing a breach of contract lies where any contract is concerned.⁵

Whether Enforceable Contract Essential. — The action for enticement of servants was given originally only where there was a binding contract of service,⁶ and it has been held in modern cases that such a contract must be proved.⁷ On the other hand, the existence of a de facto relation of master and servant has been held sufficient to sustain the action,⁸ or the enticement of workmen doing piece work without reference to a time contract.⁹ In the modern cases which

3. Action for Breach Confined to Contracts of Service. — Procuring a breach of contract between master and servant is a cause of action, but interference with contracts generally is actionable only when the means used in procuring the breach are unlawful and actionable. In such cases the breach of contract "goes only to the question of damages, that is, how and in what manner and to what extent has the plaintiff been injured by the fraud, deceit, or other wrongful act of the defendant." Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 578. To the same effect see Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 121, 34 Am. St. Rep. 165; Bourlier v. Macauley, 91 Ky. 135, 34 Am. St. Rep. 171; Glencoe Land, etc., Co. v. Hudson Brothers Commission Co., 138 Mo. 439, 60 Am. St. Rep. 560, McCann v. Wolff, 28 Mo. App. 447.

4. Contracts for Exclusive Personal Service. — Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216. To the same effect is Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, though the definition of "malice" is made more comprehensive there. See the next subdivision infra.

"We are satisfied that it [the right of action for enticing servants] is founded upon the legal right derived from the contract, and not merely upon the relation of master and servant; and that it applies to all contracts of employment, if not to contracts of every description." Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 567.

Dramatic Artist. — In Bourlier v. Macauley, 91 Ky. 135, 34 Am. St. Rep. 171, it was held, contrary to the first case cited in this note, that a dramatic artist was not within the principle of the allowance of a remedy for enticement. The scope of the latter remedy is governed in Kentucky by statute.

5. Applied in Various Classes of Contracts. — Angle v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 151 U. S. 1 (contract for construction of railroad); Nash- ville, etc., R. Co. v. McConnell, 82 Fed. Rep. 65 (contract with carrier of passengers); Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592 (contract for sale of lumber); Morgan v. Andrews, 107 Mich. 33 (contract to construct machine); Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. Car. 356 (contract with carrier for transportation of goods). See also the old case of Shepherd v. Wakeman, Sid. 79, where an action for inducing a breach of promise of marriage was allowed.

In Temperton v. Russell, (1893) 1 Q. B. 715, Lopes, L. J., affirmed "the broad principle that a person who induces a party to a contract to break it, intending thereby to injure another person or to get a benefit for himself, commits an actionable wrong." Much to the same effect are the remarks of the other judges. As representing the present English rule this case must be modified by the results of Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 1. See infra, this section, Malice.

Dicta to the Effect that Procuring the Breach of Any Contract maliciously is actionable are found in the following cases, which really involved contracts of service: Chiple v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367; Lucke v. Clothing Cutters, etc., Assembly No. 7507, 77 Md. 396, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421; Lally v. Cantwell, 30 Mo. App. 524 (probably overruled in this particular by Glencoe Land, etc., Co. v. Hudson Brothers Commission Co., 138 Mo. 439, 60 Am. St. Rep. 560).

extend the remedy for interference to contracts generally, stress is usually laid on other circumstances, and the existence of a binding contract is not required.¹

3. Malice.—According to the accepted definition, malice in common acceptation means ill will against a person; but in its legal sense it means a wrongful, i. e., an unlawful, act done intentionally, without just cause or excuse.² Considering, as the general statements of the cases developing the doctrine of actionable interference with contract require,³ that malice is an essential ingredient of the action, the reasoning is somewhat as follows: Breach of contract gives a cause of action against the contracting party guilty of the breach, and is therefore a wrongful or unlawful act. The procurement of a wrongful act is itself wrongful. Therefore the procurement of a breach of contract is wrongful,⁴ and if the procurement is intentional⁵ and without excuse it follows that it is malicious. There is a step in this reasoning which assumes too much. It is that the procurement of an act which gives a cause of action against the actor is universally wrongful. This is settled by precedent in the case of contracts of hire, but it is contrary to analogies when applied to contracts universally,⁶ since it involves the propo-

The Fact that No Action Lies Against the Party Terminating a Contract at the instance of the defendant does not prevent an action against the defendant. Chiple v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367. But compare Raycroft v. Tayntoi, 68 Vt. 219, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882.

1. Interference with Nonenforceable Contracts of Sale.—Thus interference by fraudulent misrepresentations which prevent the completion of a nonenforceable verbal contract of sale is actionable. Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 20 Am. Rep. 623; Rice v. Manley, 66 N. Y. 82, 23 Am. Rep. 30.

So an action will lie for interference by threats preventing the performance of such a contract. Jackson v. Stanfield, 137 Ind. 592.

See further as to procuring the termination of contracts infra, this title, Preventing Formation or Inducing Termination of Contract.

2. Malice Defined.—This is the definition of Bayley, J., in Bromage v. Prosser, 4 B. & C. 255, 10 E. C. L. 323. This definition has been adopted "in hundreds of cases, both civil and criminal." North, J., in Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 40.

3. See supra, this section, General Statement.

4. Procuring Violation of Right Is Wrongful.—Erle, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 232, 75 E. C. L. 232, said: "It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all instances where the violation is an actionable wrong, as in violations of a right to property, whether real or personal, or to personal security; he who procures the wrong is a joint wrongdoer, and may be sued, either alone or jointly with the agent, in the appropriate action for the wrong complained of."

5. Notice Held to Imply Malice.—In Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 224, 75 E. C. L. 224, Crompton, J., said that if interrupting the relation of master and servant is wrongful and malicious, "or, which is the same thing, with notice," it is actionable.

That knowledge is an essential ingredient of such actions, see Jones v. Blocker, 43 Ga. 331.

It was early laid down that retaining a hired servant of another without knowledge of the previous hiring was not actionable. F. N. B. 168 c.

6. Contract Creates Only Right in Personam.—The foundation upon which actions for enticing servants rest was said by Blackstone to be "the property that every man has in the service of his domestics." 1 Black. Com. 429. But an ordinary contract does not create a property right as against third persons, i. e., a right in rem; it creates only a right in personam against the other party to the contract. Proceeding on this basis it was said by Cave, J., in Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 34, that a right of action for procuring the violation of contracts is anomalous, "because in no other instance in the English law that I am aware of does a right ex contractu give rise to a right in rem. In no other case that I know of can two persons by agreement between themselves create an obligation binding on all the rest of the world." He pointed out also the anomaly of holding this right in rem "available against all the world except the co-contractor whose consent to the contract is supposed to have given birth to this anomalous right in rem." But, as Sir Frederick Pollock says, the duty of third persons to refrain from procuring a breach of contract "is not an obligation under the contract, any more than when A sells his land to B, the duty of all men to respect the rights of B instead of A, as owner of that land, is a duty under the contract of sale or the conveyance." Pollock on Contracts (4th ed.) 192, note. But compare Pollock on Torts (1st ed.) 450.

It is sometimes said to be a general rule of law that only the contracting parties are liable for the breach of a contract. Coleridge, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 246, 75 E. C. L. 246; Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 580; Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 121, 34 Am. St. Rep. 165; Bourlier v. Macauley, 91 Ky. 135, 34 Am. St. Rep. 171; Glencoe Land, etc., Co. v. Hudson Brothers Commission Co., 138 Mo. 439, 60 Am. St. Rep. 560. But, as indicated by the last quotation, admitting a remedy for procuring a breach perhaps involves no denial of this, and the statement of such a general rule, for present purposes, rests on negative authority only sition that merely to persuade a person to break a contract is actionable though the persuasion is bona fide, unless the person using such persuasion acts in the assertion of some superior right.¹ A new definition of malice was invented to apply in this connection, and a malicious act was defined as an act done "for the indirect purpose of injuring the plaintiff or of benefiting the defendant at the expense of the plaintiff."² The test here is no longer the character of the act done, but the motive of the actor, and according to this view an act lawful in itself may be unlawful because done with a bad motive.³ A number of dicta and some cases support such a view,⁴ but it is apparent that where the means used are themselves unlawful, for instance when they involve fraud or slander, no question of malice in the sense of motive is involved, and a cause of action for inducing a breach of contract by such means may arise on well-settled principles.⁵ On the other hand, where the means employed are not unlawful according to settled standards, the existence of a bad motive does not, under some authorities, make the interference producing breach actionable.⁶

4. Means Employed to Induce Breach. — Where the means employed to induce the breach of contract are wrongful or unlawful, the interference may give rise to a cause of action under one of the well-recognized heads of tort;⁷ thus when the act of interference is fraudulent or slanderous, or when it constitutes a nuisance, or is accompanied with violence or threats.⁸ Interference — lack of precedents. See the opinion of Coleridge, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 250, 75 E. C. L. 250.

See the remarks of Holmes, J., in May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 14, to the effect that the allowance of an action for maliciously procuring a breach of contract is supported by reason and analogy.

1. Bona Fide Persuasion. — Coleridge, J., in Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 247, 75 E. C. L. 247, put the case of one bona fide persuading and inducing the breach of a contract. Brett, L. J., in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 338, admitted that this might not be actionable. See also Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 583; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555.

by mere persuasion is, according to some authorities, not actionable except in the case of servants or persons under contract for exclusive personal services.¹ Other authorities, however, appear to allow an action in such a case wherever the interference is malicious.²

Whether Combination or Conspiracy Is Per Se Unlawful is discussed elsewhere.³

5. Damages Produced by Breach. — According to some dicta it must be shown that special damage has resulted from the interference producing the breach,⁴ and this doctrine seems supported by some analogies.⁵

Natural and Probable Consequences. — It is not a tenable objection that the damages resulting from the breach of contract, being the result of the free act of the delinquent contracting party, are not the natural and probable consequence of the interference and are therefore too remote.⁶ But it must be shown that the breach resulted from the defendant's interference.⁷

III. PREVENTING FORMATION OR INDUCING TERMINATION OF CONTRACT. — According to some authorities, an actionable interference with contract relations is not confined to cases where the contract is binding and valid. It is actionable likewise maliciously to induce the termination of a contract terminable at will or to prevent the formation of contracts which in the natural course and but for such interference would have been formed.⁸ "Maliciously"

"The ground of liability is not false statements, but the intentional causing of temporal damage, without justifiable cause, by any means contemplated as effectual, and proving so in the event." Holmes, J., dissenting, in May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 15, and citing Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, and Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148.

3. See the title LABOR COMBINATIONS. A well-reasoned late case answering the question in the negative is Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223. Compare Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496.

4. Special Damage. — See the remark of Brett, L. J., in Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 333, quoted supra, this title, Introductory, note 4. See also Temperton v. Russell, (1893) 1 Q. B. 729.

In Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367, it was held that damage must result to give the action, but it appears that if, from inability to estimate the damages resulting from the breach, nominal damages only can be found, this is sufficient.

5. See Green v. Button, 2 C. M. & R. 707, a case of slander of title producing breach of a contract, and the closely analogous case of Benton v. Pratt, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 385, 20 Am. Dec. 623, where the performance of a contract was prevented by fraudulent misrepresentations.

In Actions for Enticing Servants the Measure of Damages is not limited to the value of the servants enticed away, but the plaintiff may recover the damages caused by their leaving him at the time, considering the circumstances of his business. Gunter v. Astor, 4 Moo. 12, 16 E. C. L. 357, 21 Rev. Rep. 733; Hewitt v. Ontario Copper Lightning Rod Co., 44 U. C. Q. B. 287.

6. Special Damage. — Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 338 [disapproving pro tanto Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East 1, 2 Smith Lead. Cas. 554]; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252.

In States where an Action for Interference Is Not Recognized in the case of contracts generally, it is said that the direct and proximate cause of damage is the defendant's voluntary breach of contract. Chambers v. Baldwin, 91 Ky. 121, 34 Am. St. Rep. 165; Glencoe Land, etc., Co. v. Hudson Brothers Commission Co., 138 Mo. 439, 60 Am. St. Rep. 560.

7. Causal Connection Must Be Shown. — Consequently the action will not be supported by a voluntary termination of the contract relation by the plaintiff in consequence of the defendant's interference, nor by the defendant's unsuccessful malicious attempt to terminate the contract. Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367. To the same effect see Gauthier v. Perrault, 6 Quebec Q. B. 65, affirmed 28 Can. Sup. Ct. 241.

8. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555. See also Johnston Harvester Co. v. Meinhardt, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 489, 9 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 396.

Preventing Formation of Contracts. — In May v. Wood, 172 Mass. 14, Holmes, J., in a dis- here is to be understood as implying an indirect purpose of injuring the person who is damaged or of benefiting the interferer at the expense of the damaged person without just, i. e., lawful, cause or excuse.¹ This doctrine naturally follows from the more comprehensive principle of the right to be protected in freedom of business.² Other authorities hold that an action lies in such a case only where the means employed are unlawful.³

IV. WHAT IS JUSTIFICATION. — What amounts to justification negating malice is not settled on broad principles. It seems established, however, that trade competition justifies the use of lawful means to prevent the formation of contracts with rival traders,⁴ though whether it would justify the procurementing opinion, laid down this proposition as settled law in Massachusetts: "An action will lie for depriving a man of custom, that is, of possible contracts, as well when the result is effected by persuasion as when it is accomplished by fraud or force, if the harm is inflicted simply from malevolence and without some justifiable cause, such as competition in trade."

An Employer Forbidding His Employees to Trade at a Particular Store has been held to give a cause of action to the merchant injured. Graham v. St. Charles St. R. Co., 47 La. Ann. 214, 49 Am. St. Rep. 366. Contra, Payne v. Western, etc., R. Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666; Robison v. Texas Pine Land Assoc., (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 40 S. W. Rep. 843. In the last case the employer was running a similar store, and the element of competition was held to enter into the case.

Procuring Termination of Contract. — In Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367, the plaintiff, who brought suit for procuring his discharge, was employed as a general superintendent by a manufacturing concern. It was alleged that the employment was to continue "for a long period of time," but it was held that neither the fact that the employment was not for a definite time nor the fact that no action lay against the employer for the discharge would bar the action against the person maliciously procuring the discharge. A very similar case is Lucke v. Clothing Cutters, etc., Assembly No. 7507, 77 Md. 396, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421, wherein the Chipley case was quoted with approval.

The Damage Recoverable in such cases is not the loss of the value of actual contracts, but "the loss of advantages, either of property or of personal benefit, which, but for such interference, the plaintiff would have been able to attain or enjoy." Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, quoted in Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 160, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252.

1. Meaning of "Maliciously." — Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555. And see Temperton v. Russell, (1893) 1 Q. B. 715, and supra, this title, Malice.

2. See the opinion of Cave, J., in Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 28, and generally the titles LABOR COMBINATIONS; MASTER AND SERVANT; SLANDER OF TITLE.

3. Unlawful Means an Essential. — Allen v. Flood (1898) A. C. 1; Perrault v. Gauthier, 28 Can. Sup. Ct. 241, affirming 6 Quebec Q. B. 65, which reversed to Quebec Super. Ct. 224, which reversed 6 Quebec Super. Ct. 83; Perkins v. Pendleton, 90 Me. 166, 60 Am. St. Rep. 252; Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225, 46 Am. St.

Rep. 373; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223; Lally v. Cantwell, 30 Mo. App. 524; Payne v. Western, etc., R. Co., 13 Lea (Tenn.) 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

This seems to be the effect of Raycroft v. Tayntor, 68 Vt. 219, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882. The defendant procured the plaintiff's discharge by threatening that he, the defendant, would terminate certain contracts between himself and the plaintiff's employer unless the latter discharged the plaintiff, who was working under a contract terminable at will. The defendant appeared to be actuated solely by malevolence towards the plaintiff. It was held that the action would not lie, since the defendant only threatened to do what he had a lawful right to do. See further infra, this title, What Is Justification, notes.

Preventing Formation by Conspiracy. — In Temperton v. Russell, (1893) 1 Q. B. 715, it was held that to prevent the formation of contracts by conspiracy was actionable, and the judges seem to have been of opinion that the doctrine of malicious interference with existing contracts would have been applicable even in the absence of conspiracy. This, however, was not involved in the case.

Slander. — In Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 367, it appears that the defendant was guilty of slander, though the decision is not placed on the ground that the means employed in effecting the discharge were unlawful. See also Lally v. Cantwell, 30 Mo. App. 524.

Action of Labor Organization. — In Lucke v. Clothing Cutters, etc., Assembly No. 7507, 77 Md. 396, 39 Am. St. Rep. 421, the breach was effected by threats from a labor organization. See generally on this question the title LABOR COMBINATIONS.

4. Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, (1892) A. C. 25, affirming 23 Q. B. D. 598; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555.

Justification — Scope of Competition. — In the dearth of authority on this question, the remarks of Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting, in Vegelahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443, are suggestive: "It is on the question of what shall amount to a justification, and more especially on the nature of the considerations which really determine or ought to determine the answer to that question, that judicial reasoning seems to me often to be inadequate. The true grounds of decision are considerations of policy and of social advantage, and it is vain to suppose that solutions can be attained merely by logic and the general propositions of law which nobody disputes. Propositions as to public policy rarely ment of the breach of existing contracts is questionable.¹ It appears that the very theory of malicious interference with contract relations as an actionable wrong requires that, in order to be justified, the act of interference or procurement must be founded upon the pursuit by the actor of some lawful interest or object for himself,² though some cases seek to find the reconciliation of two opposing lines of authorities in the rule that an act legal in itself and violating no superior right of another is justified.³

Whether the Fact that a Combination of Persons Is the Actor in procuring a breach or the nonformation of contracts deprives what would otherwise be justification of that character, is not settled.⁴

are unanimously accepted, and still more rarely, if ever, are capable of unanswerable proof. * * * The policy of allowing free competition justifies the intentional inflicting of temporal damage, including the damage of interference with a man's business, by some means, when the damage is done not for its own sake, but as an instrumentality in reaching the end of victory in the battle of trade.

* * * I have seen the suggestion made that the conflict between employers and employed is not competition. But I venture to assume that none of my brethren would rely on that suggestion. If the policy on which our law is founded is too narrowly expressed in the term 'free competition,' we may substitute 'free struggle for life.' Certainly the policy is not limited to struggles between persons of the same class competing for the same end. It applies to all conflicts of temporal interests."

1. See the case of enticement of servants mentioned in the next note following, and the remarks of Lord Herschell in Allen v. Flood, (1898) A. C. 123. See also an article by Prof. E. W. Huffcut in 37 Am. L. Reg. & Rev. 275.

2. Whether Justification Requires Pursuit of Some Interest.—In Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, it was declared that "competition or the service of any interest or lawful purpose" amounts to justification. This doctrine seems to lie at the very basis of the whole theory of malicious interference with contracts; namely, that interference is actionable unless justified by some lawful cause or excuse. There is, however, a sentence in the opinion which has been drawn into the service of a different rule. Explaining the cases requiring, in order to constitute an actionable wrong, the violation of a definite legal right of the plaintiff, it was said: "But those are cases, for the most part at least, where the defendants were themselves acting in the lawful exercise of some distinct right, which furnished the defense of a justifiable cause for their acts, except so far as they were in violation of a superior right in another." The court proceeded to illustrate by the case of enticing workmen. If they are under definite contracts and the enticement is with notice, the defendant's lawful effort to further his own business by employing them is no justification, for he acts in violation of a superior contract right in another; if they are employed under terminable contracts, no superior right is violated, and the defendant's lawful pursuit of his own business interests is justification, though in fact he may act maliciously. The meaning here is, as illustrated, in harmony with the text, but the passage has been quoted as showing that the exercise of any distinct legal right (no superior right being violated) justifies procuring a breach. See article by Wm. L. Hodge in 28 Am. L. Rev. 54; Raycroft v. Tayntor, 68 Vt. 219, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882; Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 370.

That Pursuit of Some Legitimate Interest is essential to justify interference with the business of another is asserted in decisions based on the theory of freedom to do business unhindered. See Delz v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755.

A Stockholder in a Corporation has a right to express his opinion freely about the contracts of the corporation, but if, by the use of wilful and malicious fraud and deceit, he induces the corporation to be guilty of breach of a contract between the plaintiff and such corporation, the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for damages. Morgan v. Andrews, 107 Mich. 33.

3. Justification Requires More than Performance of Lawful Act.—If it be admitted that the employment of any act lawful in itself is justified to effect the termination of a terminable contract (no superior right is, in general, involved in such a case), the criterion is the lawfulness of the means, and there is no place for malice in the sense of motive. The practical effect of separating the lawful pursuit of some legitimate interest on the part of the defendant from the idea of justification seems to be to overrule the doctrine of the line of cases cited supra, p. 1113, note 4, and not to reconcile those authorities with the cases on p. 1113, note 6. The very point in the former cases is that the principle announced in the latter is not of universal application. Yet in Raycroft v. Tayntor, 68 Vt. 219, 54 Am. St. Rep. 882, adopting what is conceived to be a misconception in an article in 28 Am. L. Rev. 54, such a holding is held to be in harmony with both lines of decisions. Somewhat similar is Chipley v. Atkinson, 23 Fla. 206, 11 Am. St. Rep. 370; but the effect of the ruling therein seems to bring the case in line with the cases holding motive a criterion.

4. Effect of Combination on Justification.—The doctrine of many cases seems to be that acts which, if done by one, would be justified as based on competition can claim no such privilege when done by a body of men conspiring together. See Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co., 83 Fed. Rep. 912; Vegeahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443, and the dissenting opinion of Holmes, J., therein. Contra, Hutley v. Simmons, (1898) 1 Q. B. 181, following Kearney v. Lloyd, 26 L. R. Ir. 268. A full treatment of this question will be given under the title LABOR COMBINATIONS.

INTERIM. — A Latin word, signifying in the meanwhile, in the intervening time; used as an adjective in the sense of "temporary."¹

INTERIOR. — Interior means inland; remote or distant from the coast.²

INTERLINE—INTERLINEATION. (See also the titles ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS, vol. 2, p. 181; WILLS.) To interline is to write between lines already written, for the purpose of adding to or correcting what is written.³

INTERLOCUTORY. (See also INTERLOCUTORY ORDERS, JUDGMENTS, AND DECREES, 11 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 439; and in this work the title FINAL JUDGMENTS AND DECREES, vol. 13, p. 23.) — Interlocutory (in law) means that which does not decide the cause, but only settles some intervening matter relating to the cause.⁴

INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTIONS. — See the title INJUNCTIONS, ante, p. 345.

1. Interim Factor. — A judicial officer appointed under the bankruptcy law of Scotland, to preserve the estate until a fit person shall be elected trustee. 2 Bell's Com. 299.

Interim Curator. — An officer appointed by the justice of the peace under the statute 33 & 34 Vict., c. 23, which abolished forfeiture and escheat on conviction of treason and felony, to have the custody and management of the property of the convict. 4 Steph. Com. 419.

2. More Interior District. — A United States statute provided that if any ship which should arrive within the limits of any district of the United States, from any foreign port or place, should depart therefrom, unless to proceed on her way to some more interior district, before report or entry should have been made by the master, the master should forfeit the sum of four hundred dollars. In construing this statute the court said: "In this section the legislature intended, by 'more interior district,' a district which, with reference to local and geographical position, and in common usage, is deemed interior to another, that is, further within the indentations or inlets of the contiguous or surrounding country than that in which the vessel has already arrived, and through which she would or might ordinarily pass in order to reach such inner district. I have not found the words used in any other section of the act; but in the close of the 18th section the words 'interior port' occur in a sense exactly like that which I feel constrained to apply to the section under examination." U. S. v. Bearer, 4 Mason (U. S.) 195.

3. Russell v. Eubanks, 84 Mo. 88. This case arose upon the construction of a will.

Interlineation. — In Bagshaw v. Canning, 52 J. P. 583, it was held that the term interlineation was not confined to something written between the lines, but included anything put into any of the lines, though written on the line.

4. Mora v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., (N. Y. Super. Ct. Spec. T.) 13 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 304, 22 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 60.

Interlocutory and Final Distinguished—Decrees. — The words interlocutory and "final" have received frequent construction, of which the following are instances: "According to Harrison's Practice in Chancery 622, 'a decree is final when all the circumstances and facts material and necessary to a complete explanation of the matters in litigation are brought before the court, and so fully and clearly ascertained by the pleadings on both sides that the court is enabled from them to collect the respective merits of the parties litigant, and upon full consideration of the case made out and relied upon by each, determines between them according to equity and good conscience.'

'A decree is interlocutory when it happens that some material circumstance or fact, necessary to be made known to the court, is either not stated in the pleadings, or so imperfectly ascertained by them, that the court, by reason of that defect, is unable to determine finally between the parties; and therefore a reference to or an inquiry before a master, or a trial of the facts before a jury, becomes necessary to have the doubts occasioned by that defect removed. The court, in the meantime, suspends its final judgment, until by the master's report or the verdict of a jury it is enabled to decide finally.' " Travis v. Waters, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 508. See also Griffin v. Orman, 9 Fla. 22, 46.

"The term 'interlocutory decree' is generally applied to decrees in which some matter either of law or of fact is directed preparatory to a final decision." Brush Electric Co. v. California Electric Light Co., 7 U. S. App. 212, citing 2 Daniell's Ch. Pl. and Pr. (1st Am. ed.) 1152, note a.

In Richmond v. Atwood, 5 U. S. App. 164, it was said: "Decrees are either final or interlocutory. If the decree determined all the questions in issue between the parties, and did not adjourn any matter for further consideration, it was called a final decree. In strictness, however, a decree was said to be interlocutory until it was signed and enrolled. For. Rom. 183. But ordinarily it has been termed interlocutory when it was pronounced for the purpose of ascertaining matter of law or of fact previously to a final decree."

In Teaff v. Hewitt, 1 Ohio St. 520, it was said: "An interlocutory decree is one which leaves the equity of the case, or some material question connected with it, for future determination. Where the future action of the court is necessary to give the complete relief contemplated by the court, upon the merits, the decree under which the further question arises is to be regarded, not as final, but as interlocutory." Citing Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. (Va.) 22.

And as to the distinction between final and interlocutory decrees see the following cases: Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How. (U. S.) 201; Barnard v. Gibson, 7 How. (U. S.) 650; Perkins v. Fourniquet, 14 How. (U. S.) 313; Beebe v. Russell, 19 How. (U. S.) 283; Humiston v.

INTERLUDE. — An interlude is a short dramatic piece, generally accompanied with music; usually represented or performed between the acts of a longer performance.¹

INTERMEDDLE. — To intermeddle means to meddle with the affairs of others in which one has no concern; to meddle officiously; to interpose or interfere improperly; to intermix.

INTERMEDIATE. — Intervening; interposing; lying between.²

Same — Judgments. — “Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the middle of a cause, upon some plea, proceeding, or default, which is only intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit.” 3 Black. Com. 396, quoted in Turner v. Browder, 18 B. Mon. (Ky.) 827.

An interlocutory judgment is one which determines some preliminary or subordinate point or plea, or settles some step, question, or default arising in the progress of the cause, but does not adjudicate the ultimate rights of the parties or finally put the case out of court. Fuller v. Tuska, (C. Pl. Gen. T.) 17 N. Y. Supp. 357.

In State v. Judge, 42 La. Ann. 319, it was said: “An interlocutory judgment is one which does not decide on the merits. It is either ancillary to or executory of the final and complete adjudication of the case.”

In Elliott v. Mayfield, 3 Ala. 226, it was said: “Judgments are either interlocutory or final. Interlocutory judgments are such as are given in the progress of a cause upon some plea, proceeding, or default which is only intermediate, and does not finally determine or complete the suit, but contemplates further proceedings for that purpose. * * * Final judgments are such as at once finish the proceedings by declaring that the plaintiff either has or has not entitled himself to the redress he sought, and by ascertaining what amount he shall recover.”

An interlocutory judgment is one given in the course of a cause before final judgment. Nacoochee Hydraulic Min. Co. v. Davis, 40 Ga. 320. See also Snell v. Bridgewater Cotton Gin Mfg. Co., 24 Pick. (Mass.) 296; Ward v. Ward, 37 Tex. 389.

For a full discussion of this subject, not only as to the meaning of interlocutory and “final,” but also as to what judgments and decrees, etc., are interlocutory and what are final, see the note to Williams v. Field, (2 Wis. 421), 60 Am. Dec. 426.

Same — Interlocutory Order. (See also ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR., title APPEALS, vol. 2, p. 52; ORDERS, vol. 15, p. 327.) — In Standard Discount Co. v. La Grange, 3 C. P. D. 71, it was said: “The order was not the final step in the action, and therefore it is interlocutory.”

In Meyers v. Becker, 29 Hun (N. Y.) 573, affirmed 95 N. Y. 486, it was said: “Interlocutory orders are made to secure some end and purpose necessary and essential to the progress of the suit, and generally collateral to the issues formed by the pleadings and not connected with the final judgment. Every direction of a court made in an action is an order, unless it is contained in a judgment.”

The decision of the High Court upon a special case stated for its opinion by an arbitrator, who is hereupon to make his award, is an “interlocutory order.” Collins v. Pad-dington, 5 Q. B. D. 368.

In Smith v. Cowell, 6 Q. B. D. 75, it was held that the term “interlocutory order” as used in an English judicature act was not confined to an order made between writ and final judgment, but meant an order other than a final judgment in an action, whether such order was made before the judgment or after.

1. Society, etc., v. Diers, 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 156.

Intermeddle. — McQueen v. Babcock, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 339, 3 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 129, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 428. This case arose upon the construction of an injunction against an assignee intermeddling with, receiving, or collecting any property of the assignor, and it was held that the bringing of an action of trespass by the assignee against any person who interfered with the property assigned was not an intermeddling with the property.

2. Intermediate Tolls. — Tolls collected from persons who travel over the road, but who do not pass by, through, or around the toll gates. Hollingworth v. State, 29 Ohio St. 552. See generally the title TURNPIKES.

Intermediate Order. (See also the title ORDERS, 15 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 315.) — In Taylor v. Smith, 24 N. Y. App. Div. 526, it was said: “Accurately speaking, an order granted before entry of judgment is an inter- mediate order, while one granted hereafter is not. But no sensible or substantial distinction exists between the two cases, for if the judgment is necessarily affected in the one case, it must be so in the other, and vice versa. See also Fox v. Matthiessen, 84 Hun (N. Y.) 396.

Orders denying motions to set aside a verdict are not intermediate orders. Selden v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 29 N. Y. 634. Nor is an order substituting the personal representative of a deceased plaintiff in his stead an intermediate order. Hackett v. Belden, 47 N. Y. 624.

Reinterment.—In Scadding v. St. Pancras, W. N. (89) 45, 120, it was held that a reinterment of human remains was not an interment.

2. Internal Commerce. (See also the title INTERSTATE COMMERCE.)—In New York it was held that an injunction will not lie to restrain a steamboat company from plying between New York and Troy on the Hudson, by way of New Jersey, on the ground that the state of New York has granted the sole right to navigate these waters for a term of years. North River Steam Boat Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 713.

3. Internal Improvements.—In Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colfax County, 4 Neb. 456, 3 Cent. L. J. 288, it was said: “What are works of internal improvement? The Supreme Court of Alabama, in defining the phrase internal improvements, say: ‘Where internal improvements under state authority are spoken of, it is universally understood that works within the state, by which the public are supposed to be benefited, are intended, such as the improvement of highways and channels of travel and commerce.’” Citing Wetumpka v. Winter, 29 Ala. 660.

The phrase internal improvements is applied to improvements of highways, channels of travel and commerce, etc. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Colfax County, 4 Neb. 456; Traver v. Merri-cick County, 14 Neb. 333.

Beet-sugar Manufactories.—In Getchell v. Benton, 30 Neb. 870, it was held that beet-sugar manufactories which did not manufacture sugar from beets for toll, although propelled by water power, were not within legislative control, and therefore were not works of internal improvement.

Railroads, etc.—In State v. Thorne, 9 Neb. 458, it was suggested that works of internal improvement might include railroads, turnpikes, canals, and numerous other enterprises not objects of private concern alone.

Public Building.—In In re Internal Imp. Fund, 24 Colo. 247, it was held that public buildings, such as an asylum, state house, etc., were not internal improvements, within a Colorado act providing that the proceeds of the sale of certain public lands should be paid to the state for the purpose of making internal improvements.

Court House.—In Dawson County v. McNamar, 10 Neb. 276, it was held that the building of a county court house was not a work of internal improvement. It was said that works of internal improvement meant only those works within the state in which the whole body of the people was supposed to be more or less interested and by which it might be benefited.

And as to whether a court house is a work of internal improvement see Lewis v. Sherman County, 5 Fed. Rep. 271.

Public Reservoirs for the storage of water for irrigation and domestic uses are internal improvements within the meaning of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1875, providing that five per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of agricultural public lands lying within the state of Colorado shall be paid to the state for the purpose of making such internal improvements within the state as the legislature may direct. In re Senate Resolution, etc., 12 Colo. 287.

Waterworks.—In Yesler v. Seattle, 1 Wash. 311, it was held that the term internal improvements included waterworks, sewers, and artificial-ice plants. This case arose upon the question whether the act authorizing cities and towns to contract for internal improvements sufficiently expressed its subject in the title where the body of the act treated of waterworks, sewers, and artificial-ice plants.

Mill and Water Power.—Bonds issued by the county commissioners of a county in Nebraska, on behalf of a precinct in that county, to aid a company in improving the water power of a river for the purpose of propelling public grist mills are issued to aid in constructing a “work of internal improvement.” Blair v. Cum-ington County, 111 U. S. 363.

So in Guernsey v. Burlington Tp., 4 Dill. (U. S.) 374, negotiable bonds made by the defendant township, reciting that they were issued for the purpose of aiding internal improvements in such township, were held valid in the hands of a holder for value, although they were in fact issued to aid in the improvement of a water power and the erection of a watermill owned by a private person. The court said: “Inasmuch as the bond states that it is issued to aid ‘internal improvements in the township,’ and as the general legislation of the state shows that internal improvements mean such public improvements as may legitimately be aided by taxation, I am inclined to think that the purchaser may assume, without inquiry, aliunde the bond and legislative act, that the bond is within the competency of the legislature to authorize."

In Traver v. Merrick County, 14 Neb. 327, 45 Am. Rep. 111, a water gristmill for public use and under public regulation was held to be a work of internal improvement within a statute authorizing the issue of public bonds. See also Burlington Tp. v. Beasley, 94 U. S. 310.

But in Osborne v. Adams County, 106 U. S. 181, it was held that a steam gristmill was not a work of internal improvement. See also Osborne v. Adams County, 109 U. S. 1; State v. Adams County, 15 Neb. 569.

Bridges. — In De Clerq v. Hager, 12 Neb. 185, it was held that bridges built by a county upon the line of its highways and wholly within the county were not works of internal improvement.

But in State v. Keith County, 16 Neb. 508, a bridge across the Platte river was held to be a work of internal improvement. See also Fremont Bldg. Assoc. v. Sherwin, 6 Neb. 48; State v. Babcock, 23 Neb. 179; Dodge County v. Chandler, 96 U. S. 205; U. S. v. Dodge County, 110 U. S. 156.

1. International. — In Koehler v. Sanders, 122 N. Y. 72, it was said, "The word international is a generic term pertaining to relation between nations, and when applied to business or to transactions of private character it imports dealings of some sort in matters or with people of different nations, or which have some relation to them."

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES — 1. Definition. — International law has been defined as the rules which determine the conduct of the general body of civilized states in their dealings with one another.¹ The term is of modern origin, and has quite generally among modern writers displaced the term "law of nations," which was in general use until the early part of this century, and is still occasionally used.²

2. Nature of International Law. — There has been, and still is, great difference of opinion as to whether international law is properly to be considered true law. This divergence is, however, chiefly a result of the differing views as to the proper scope of the term "law," some contending that law consists only of commands propounded by a political superior to a political inferior and enforceable by penalties, while others give to the term a broader scope.³

1. Definition. — Lawrence on Int. Law, § 1.

Other definitions which have been given are: "The rules of conduct regulating the intercourse of states." 1 Halleck on Int. Law 41. "The aggregate of the rules which Christian states acknowledge as obligatory in their relations to each other and to each other's subjects." Woolsey on Int. Law (6th ed.), § 5. "International law consists in certain rules of conduct which modern civilized states regard as being binding on them in their relations with one another with a force comparable in nature and degree to that binding the conscientious person to obey the laws of his country, and which they also regard as being enforceable by appropriate means in case of infringement." Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.) 1.

2. Term of Modern Origin. — Dana's Wheaton's

Int. Law, § 12, and note 7; Woolsey on Int. Law, § 10.

3. International Law Not True Law. — The leading exposition of the view that international law is not law at all is to be found in Austin's Jurisprudence, lectures 5 and 6, this being in accord with that author's definition of the word "law."

In Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 153, Lord Coleridge said: "Strictly speaking, 'international law' is an inexact expression, and it is apt to mislead if its inexactness is not kept in mind. Law implies a lawgiver and a tribunal capable of enforcing it and coercing its transgressors. But there is no common lawgiver to sovereign states; and no tribunal has the power to bind them by decrees or coerce them if they transgress. The law of nations is that collection of

In support of the view that international law is a true branch of jurisprudence, attention has been called to the facts that its doctrines are founded on legal, not simply on ethical, ideas, since they purport to be rules of strict justice, not counsels of perfection; that they are discussed by the methods appropriate to jurisprudence, and not by those of moral philosophy; that framers of state papers concerning foreign policy appeal not to the general feeling of moral rightness, but to precedents, to treaties, and to opinions of specialists; and that, further, there is actually an international morality, distinct from international law in the usual sense, since a nation may do things which are discourteous, high-handed, and unfair, and yet within its admitted right and giving no formal ground of complaint.¹

3. International Law as Part of Law of Land. — International law is a part of the law of the land,² and hence, unlike foreign municipal law, it does not have to be proved as a fact, but notice of it is taken by the courts.³ Municipal statutes, likewise, should not be construed so as to infringe upon the received doctrines of international law, if such a construction can possibly be avoided.⁴ And since the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations and the policy in regard to them are placed by the Constitution in the hands of the federal government, its decisions upon these subjects are obligatory upon every citizen.⁵

4. Sources of International Law — a. TEXT WRITERS. — The writings of publicists of recognized standing, when in substantial agreement, are of great weight in determining the existing rules of international law.⁶

usages which civilized states have agreed to observe in their dealings with one another. What these usages are, whether a particular one has or has not been agreed to, must be matter of evidence. Treaties and acts of state are but evidence of the agreement of nations, and do not, in this country at least, per se bind the tribunals. Neither, certainly, does a consensus of jurists; but it is evidence of the agreement of nations on international points; and on such points, when they arise, the English courts give effect, as part of English law, to such agreement."

Contrary View. — Of this statement, Lord Russell, in his speech to the American Bar Association in 1896, said that the view expressed by Lord Coleridge is based on too narrow a definition of law, a definition which "relies too much on force as the governing idea. If the development of law is historically considered, it will be found to exclude that body of customary law which in early stages of society precedes law which assumes definitely the character of positive command coupled with punitive sanctions. * * * As government becomes more frankly democratic, * * * laws bear less and less the character of commands imposed by a coercive authority, and acquire more and more the character of customary law founded on consent. * * * I claim, then, that the aggregate of the rules to which nations have agreed to conform in their conduct towards one another are properly to be designated 'international law.'" 30 Am. L. Rev. 643.

5. Powers of Federal Government. — Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. (U. S.) 38.

6. Text Writers. — That the opinions of writers are evidence of the rules of international law has been recognized in judicial decisions. Lord Stowell in The Maria, 1 C. Rob. 351; Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U. S. 113.

In Triquit v. Bath, 3 Burr. 1478, in order to justify his own reliance on such opinions, Lord Mansfield said: "I remember, in a case before Lord Talbot, of Buvot v. Barbut, * * * Lord Talbot declared a clear opinion that the law of nations in its full extent was part of the law of England, * * * that the law of nations was to be collected from the practice of different nations and the authority of writers. Accordingly he argued and determined from such instances, and the authority of Grotius, Barbeyrac, Bynkershoek, Wiquefort, etc., there being no English writer of eminence upon the subject."

"No civilized nation that does not arrogantly set all ordinary law and justice at defiance will venture to disregard the uniform sense of the established writers on international law." 1 Kent's Com. 19.

The Institute of International Law, which is an association of the leading writers on this subject, adopts from time to time resolutions expressive of the opinions of the members on questions of international law, and these resolutions have the authority which attaches to the mature expression of the views of the leading international jurists, though frequently they state not so much what the assenting members think is the law as what they think should be the law.¹

b. TREATIES. — Treaties and conventions between states may or may not be strong evidence of rules of international law on the subjects referred to therein, according to their character and purpose. A treaty which is intended to change or fix such rules, if signed by practically all the civilized powers likely in any way to be affected by it, is of such great authority that the rules declared thereby may be considered as thereafter a part of international law.² If, however, any state intimately concerned in the subject of the rules, especially if one of the great powers, withholds its assent thereto, the treaty can be regarded as showing a tendency merely, and not as fixing an absolute rule binding on all nations.³ On the other hand, stipulations in treaties between two nations as to their mutual conduct in certain respects generally show either that the rules of international law are otherwise or that they are uncertain, since if this were not the case the stipulations would not be necessary. Such treaty stipulations may, however, if repeated in numerous treaties between different nations, gradually establish a usage and rules in accordance therewith, and they themselves will then gradually disappear as having become unnecessary.⁴

c. DECISIONS OF INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS. — The decision of an international tribunal instituted for the purpose of deciding a particular question in dispute has, it would seem, apart from the particular case, a weight dependent upon the character of the persons composing the tribunal and the reasons given for the decision.⁵

See the full discussion of the question in the opinion of Brett, J. A., in Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 127.

1. Institute of International Law. — See 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 33.

2. General Treaties or Conventions. — Among treaties which may be regarded as establishing rules of international law may be mentioned the declaration of the Congress of Vienna of 1815, which fixed diplomatic precedence, and the Geneva Convention of 1864, which, since the adhesion of the United States in 1882, may be regarded as having established the neutral character of persons and things employed in the care of the sick and wounded in war.

3. Nonconsenting States. — The Declaration of Paris asserting rules of warfare at sea, though signed by the great powers of Europe, cannot be regarded as fixing the rules in that regard, since it has not secured the adhesion of the United States, Mexico, and Spain, though its rules have been followed in all wars since that time between civilized nations. 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 254.

4. Treaties Between Particular States. — The stipulation in the treaty of 1785, between the United States and Prussia, that contraband goods should not be confiscated, but merely detained, was a case in which the treaty provision was directly contrary to the acknowledged practice of nations; and so the varying provisions as to what constitute contraband in various treaties made by the United States are but evidence of the uncertainty of the law in that regard. See infra, this title, Rights and Liabilities of Neutral Subjects — Contraband of War.

Mr. Hall, a recognized authority, says (Int. Law, 4th ed., 12) that treaties "differ only from other evidences of national opinion in that their true character can generally be better appreciated; they are strong, concrete facts, easily seized and easily understood. They are, therefore, of the greatest use as marking points in the movement of thought. If treaties modifying an existing practice, or creating a new one, are found to grow in number, and to be made between states placed in circumstances of sufficient diversity; if they are found to become nearly universal for a while, and then to dwindle away, leaving a practice more or less confirmed; then it is known that a battle has taken place between new and old ideas, that the former called in the aid of special contracts till their victory was established, and that when they no longer needed external assistance, they no longer cared to express themselves in the form of so-called conventional law. While, therefore, treaties are usually allied with a change of law, they have no power to turn controverted into authoritative doctrines, and they have but little independent effect in hastening the moment at which the alteration is accomplished."

5. International Tribunals. — Mr. Wheaton says (Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 15) that the decision of an international tribunal is entitled to greater weight than that of an admiralty court; but this would seem to be the case only when the members of the tribunal possess the

The Decisions of Prize Courts on questions of international law have, in the country in which they are rendered, the same force as precedents which belong to decisions on questions of municipal law, while in other countries they are respected in proportion to the ability of the judge and the character of the decision.¹ In England and the United States, however, there is naturally a tendency to impute greater authority to such decisions as declarations of the rules of international law than in the continental states, where decisions have no place in establishing or determining the municipal law, but are merely determinations of the rights growing out of the particular case.² The decision of a prize tribunal is supposed to be rendered with absolute impartiality, without reference to the fact that the rights of the particular state in which the tribunal is sitting, or of the subjects of such state, may be involved, the tribunal being in theory international, and not of one particular state.³ Such decisions, however, though they may be binding as precedents upon the tribunals of the same nation, are not conclusive as to the rules of international law, unless there is express or tacit assent thereto on the part of other nations.⁴

d. STATE PAPERS. — State papers and diplomatic correspondence are often of very considerable weight in determining the practice of nations, though their value is dependent to a considerable extent upon the ability of the statesmen preparing them or the occasions calling them forth. With these may be included the opinions of the legal advisers of the government on questions submitted to them by it.⁵

same character, ability, and learning as the admiralty judges and the grounds given for their decision are of a convincing character.

1. Judicial Decisions. — In Thirty Hogsheads Sugar v. Boyle, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 191, Marshall, C. J., said: "The decisions of the courts of every country show how the law of nations, in the given case, is understood in that country, and will be considered in adopting the rule which is to prevail in this. Without taking a comparative view of the justice or fairness of the rules established in the British courts and of those established in the courts of other nations, there are circumstances not to be excluded from consideration which give to those rules a claim to our attention that we cannot entirely disregard. The United States having, at one time, formed a component part of the British empire, their prize law was our prize law. When we separated, it continued to be our prize law, so far as it was adapted to our circumstances and was not varied by the power which was capable of changing it. It will not be advanced, in consequence of this former relation between the two countries, that any obvious misconstruction of public law made by the British courts will be considered as forming a rule for the American courts, or that any recent rule of the British courts is entitled to more respect than the recent rules of other countries. But a case professing to be decided on ancient principles will not be entirely disregarded, unless it be very unreasonable, or be founded on a construction rejected by other nations." See also 1 Kent's Com. 18.

2. Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 11; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 64.

Judicial Decisions Parts of Law Itself. — Mr. Dana says: "So far as international law rests on the practice of nations, judicial decisions in prize causes are parts of the law itself," since if adopted and carried out by the sovereign such a decision has the double authority of being a solemn judicial decision and also a national act, on national responsibility, both when the decision is against the court's own sovereign and his immediate interests, and also, though in a less degree, when it is in favor of the sovereign and he carries it out with the acquiescence of a neutral sovereign whose subject is the loser. Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 11.

3. Duties of Prize Tribunal. — In The Maria, 1 C. Rob. 340, Sir William Scott said, in a case involving Swedish vessels: "It is the duty of the person who sits here to determine this question exactly as he would determine the same question if sitting at Stockholm; to assert no pretensions on the part of Great Britain which he would not allow to Sweden in the same circumstances, and to impose no duties on Sweden, as a neutral country, which he would not admit to belong to Great Britain in the same character. If, therefore, I mistake the law in this matter, I mistake that which I consider, and which I mean should be considered, as the universal law upon the question." For quotations suggesting doubts as to how far this judge carried out the idea of his duty thus expressed, see Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 329a.

4. Judicial Decisions Not Necessarily Conclusive of International Rules. — So it was decided by the Geneva Arbitration Tribunal in regard to various claims that the decisions of neither the British nor the American prize tribunals could affect the mutual responsibilities of the two nations. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 329, 359. See also Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 329a; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 64.

5. State Papers. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 15.

The state papers of the United States bearing upon questions of international law, including documents issued by the presidents and the secretaries of state and the opinions of the

2. INSTRUCTIONS ISSUED BY STATES. — The executive branch of a government quite frequently issues instructions for the government of its prize courts or for the conduct of its naval or land forces during war, and these are evidence of a more or less positive nature in regard to the rights and liabilities of belligerents and neutrals.¹

5. Persons in International Law — a. STATES WHOLLY OR PARTIALLY INDEPENDENT. — The subjects of international law are primarily independent states, the distinctive marks of which are that they are communities permanently established for political ends, possessing a defined territory and independent of external control.² In addition, a state which is in part subject to the control of another state or some central authority is within the purview of international law, so far as its external affairs are not subject to that control. Members of a confederation,³ protected states, which are states that have placed themselves under the protection of other powers,⁴ and states under suzerainty,⁵ are examples of such partial independence.

b. EFFECT OF DIVISION OF STATE. — Upon the formation of one state out of part of another, the new state acquires the rights and becomes subject to the obligations of the old state, in so far as these have a direct reference to the territory included in the new state. Consequently it takes such territory subject to any privileges accorded by treaty to the subjects of other states, and likewise subject to public debts of a local character. Conversely, it succeeds to the benefit of any treaty stipulations which are directly for the benefit of the inhabitants of its territory, and it acquires also public property located within that territory.⁶

Effect of Cession of Territory. — The same general results follow a cession of part of its territory by one state to another state as when a portion of a state becomes independent. The territory is transferred, apart from treaty stipulations to the contrary, subject to the debts which specially belong to it, while no part of the general debt of the ceding state will pass with the territory ceded unless there is a special provision to that effect in the treaty of cession.⁷

c. RECOGNITION OF NEW STATE. — Apart from the rare instances in which a state is formed upon territory not previously belonging to a civilized power, or in which a state is brought by increase in its civilization within the realm of international law, new states generally come into existence by break-attorneys-general, are collected in Wharton's Digest of the International Law of the United States, prepared and issued under the auspices of the United States government.

As illustrating the effect of state papers in applying recognized principles to particular states of fact, and so tending to clarify and determine the duties of nations in those regards, the position taken in the diplomatic correspondence of this country at different times in regard to the rights and duties of neutral states, particularly during the administration of Washington and during the civil war, may be instanced. See infra, this title, Rights and Duties of Neutral States.

1. Instructions Issued by States. — The French Marine Ordinance of 1681, and the "Instructions for the Guidance of the Armies of the United States in the Field," prepared by Francis Lieber and issued by the war department in 1863, are prominent examples of this class of instruments, and have been cited freely by jurists of other nations as authority upon questions referred to therein. See Lawrence on Int. Law, § 66; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 15.

2. Independent States. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 1; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 20.

3. Confederations. — The typical example of confederation is the German confederation existing from 1820 to 1866, in which both the central authority, the diet, and the individual states had the power of receiving and accrediting envoys, of concluding treaties, and of declaring war. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 47 et seq.

4. Protected States. — Though the protectorate of Great Britain over the Ionian Islands in effect gave the full executive authority in the islands to Great Britain, it was held that it did not so merge their identity in that of the British government that their neutrality was impaired by the Crimean war. The Leucade, Spinks Prize Cases 237.

5. States under Suzerainty. — The chief examples of states under suzerainty at the present time are some of the provinces of the Turkish empire, such as Bulgaria and Egypt, which possess such external powers only as are expressly given to them. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 4; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 50.

6. Division of State. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 27.

ing off from an existing state. In this latter case, the question of recognition of the independence of the new state, either by the parent country or by a third power, arises. A third power is not justified in giving such recognition until independence is actually established, or while a substantial struggle to subdue the new state is being made by the parent country, but recognition is proper when the efforts to recover authority are so inadequate as to offer no reasonable ground for supposing that success may ultimately be obtained. Premature recognition is considered as equivalent to intervention, and may on occasion be cause for war on the part of the parent state against that giving the recognition. Such recognition of a new state as an independent nation may be by express declaration addressed to the new state, by negotiation of a treaty with it, by reception of its diplomatic agents or sending a minister to it, and in general by any act fairly indicating an intention to recognize it.¹

Communications Not Involving Recognition may, however, take place between the insurgent government and a foreign state, and of this the parent state cannot complain, since the foreign state must necessarily, for the protection of its citizens and commerce, deal with the authorities actually in control of a portion of the state, though the struggle to subdue the insurrection is still actively going on.²

II. RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS IN TIME OF PEACE — 1. Territorial Property of State — a. ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY — (1) Occupation. — Territory may be acquired by a state by occupation of land previously unoccupied by any civilized state.³ This is a matter chiefly of historical interest at the present

1. Recognition of Independence. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 26; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 57; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 16.

Mr. J. Q. Adams, secretary of state, writing to President Monroe in 1816, as stated by Mr. Hall, "pointed out admirably the considerations of law, of morals, and of expediency which are involved in recognition." Mr. Adams said: "There is a stage in such (revolutionary) contests when the party struggling for independence has, as I conceive, a right to demand its acknowledgment by neutral parties, and when the acknowledgment may be granted without departure from the obligations of neutrality. It is the stage when the independence is established as matter of fact so as to leave the chance of the opposite party to recover their dominion utterly desperate. The neutral nation must, of course, judge for itself when this period has arrived; and as the belligerent nation has the same right to judge for itself, it is very likely to judge differently from the neutral, and to make it a cause or pretext for war, as Great Britain did expressly against France in our Revolution, and substantially against Holland. If war thus results, in point of fact, from the measure of recognizing a contested independence, the moral right or wrong of the war depends upon the justice and sincerity and prudence with which the recognizing nation took the step. I am satisfied that the cause of the South Americans, so far as it consists in the assertion of independence against Spain, is just. But the justice of a cause, however it may enlist individual feelings in its favor, is not sufficient to justify third parties in siding with it. The fact and the right combined can alone authorize a neutral to acknowledge a new and disputed sovereignty." Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 70.

Question for Executive. — The courts cannot treat a revolutionary party as a state until recognized by the executive. U. S. : Palmer, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 610; The Estrella, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 298; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet. (U. Spanish Republics. — In 1818 a resolution in Congress in favor of the recognition of the independence of the Spanish republics as a result of the insurrection which had begun in 1810 was rejected, though at that time several of the South American provinces had become completely free from the Spanish domination, it not being thought that the permanence of the existing order was sufficiently assured so long as Spain had a reasonable chance of success in part of the states the recovery of which would aid her in proceeding against the others; but in 1822, the Spaniards having been expelled, with the exception of garrisons in a few isolated positions, President Monroe declared in his message to Congress that it was a question whether their right to the rank of independent states was not complete, and recognition followed shortly afterwards. See as to recognition of the South American republics and Texas, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 70; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 16.

2. Communications Not Involving Recognition. — See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 16.

3. Occupation. — In Jones v. U. S., 137 U. S. 212, in upholding the power of the United States to legislate concerning guano islands, Gray, J., speaking for the court, said: "By the law of nations, recognized by all civilized states, dominion of new territory may be acquired by discovery and occupation, as well as by cession or conquest; and when citizens or subjects of one nation, in its name, and by its authority or with its assent, take and hold time except so far as Africa is concerned, and there the matter has been generally settled by agreement between the powers interested, especially by the West African conference of 1885 at Berlin.¹ It is now generally agreed that discovery of territory alone, if not followed by occupation, is not sufficient to give title, and to give any rights the occupation must be to a certain extent continuous.²

(2) Cession and Conquest. — Territory may also be acquired through cession by one state to another. Cession may be the result of amicable negotiation and agreement, though more frequently it is the result of war and is the price paid for peace by the vanquished state.³ If the successful party to a war takes and retains possession of territory by force of arms without obtaining an actual cession it is said to acquire the territory by conquest, the results, however, being apparently the same in this case as when there is an act of cession.⁴

Effect of Cession. — The effect of cession of territory as regards the rights and obligations of the states directly concerned is considered elsewhere in this title.⁵ The laws previously existing continue until superseded by others.⁶ The individual inhabitants of conquered territory become subjects of the conquering state, as is the case when a cession of territory occurs. In modern treaties of peace and of cession, however, there is generally a provision allowing to natives of the ceded territory the right to retain their former nationality, though this is frequently on condition that they withdraw to the territory of the state allegiance to which they so retain.⁷ It has frequently been decided in the United States that the cession of territory does not affect the property rights of individuals.⁸ In a late English case it is said that while a change of sovereignty by cession ought not to affect private property, no municipal tribunal has authority to enforce such an obligation.⁹ It is not, however, the duty of the nation receiving the cession to redress wrongs which the grantor nation may have theretofore committed against individuals, except, perhaps, in cases where the wrong was so recently committed that the actual, continuous, and useful possession (although only for the purpose of carrying on a particular business, such as catching and curing fish, or working mines) of territory unoccupied by any other government or its citizens, the nation to which they belong may exercise such jurisdiction and for such period as it sees fit over territory so acquired."

In U. S. v. Repentigny, 5 Wall. (U. individual may not have had time to appeal to the courts or other authorities of the grantor nation for redress.¹

(3) Prescription. — Prescription, or long-continued firm possession, especially if undisputed, is sufficient to give an absolute title to territory possession of which was originally taken wrongfully, or where no original source of proprietary right can be shown to exist.²

(4) Accretion. — By the action of water new formations of land may arise, either in actual contact with the pre existing land or in waters near the land. In the former case the new formation belongs to the owner of the land to which it is attached, while in the latter case its ownership is generally determined by the pre-existing boundary.³

b. RIGHTS OVER RIVERS. — There has at times been considerable controversy as to the right of a nation whose territory is traversed by a river to exclude other nations from the use of such river or to impose burdens in compensation for such use, especially when the other nation possesses territory abutting on such river nearer to its source. It seems that in strictness a nation has the right so to restrain the use of its rivers by other nations. At the present day, however, there is a marked tendency among nations to permit the free use of rivers for navigation by foreigners, as a result of a more enlightened commercial policy, and numerous provisions have been made by treaty for such use.⁴

In The Anna, 5 C. Rob. (Reprint) 332, on the question as to whether small mud islands at the mouth of the Mississippi, composed of earth and trees drifted down by the river, were part of the United States, Sir William Scott said: "I think that the protection of territory is to be reckoned from these islands, and that they are the natural appendages of the coast on which they border, and from which indeed they are formed. Their elements are derived immediately from the territory, and on the principle of alluvium and increment, on which so much is to be found in the books of law. * * * Consider what the consequence would be if lands of this description were not considered as appendant to the mainland, and as comprised within the bounds of territory. If they do not belong to the United States of America, any other power might occupy them; they might be embanked and fortified. What a thorn would this be in the side of America! It is physically possible at least that they might be so occupied by European nations, and then the command of the river would be no longer in America, but in such settlements."

4. Rights over Rivers. — See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 39; 1 Halleck on Int. Law 147; Woolsey on Int. Law, § 62. See also the title WATERCOURSES.

The Mississippi and St. Lawrence. — During the ownership by Spain of both banks of the Mississippi at its mouth, a question arose as to the right of the United States to make use of the river from its source to the sea, but this was settled by treaty in 1795. The right of the United States to make use of the St. Lawrence river passing through British territory has been at times a matter of dispute between Great Britain and the United States, the latter insisting on the right of free passage, the lakes by which it is fed being in large part bounded by the United States. In reference to this, Sir Robert Phillimore (Int. Law, 3d ed., 245) says: "It is difficult to deny that Great Britain may have grounded her refusal upon strict law; but it is at least equally difficult to deny, first, that in so doing she puts in force an extreme and hard law; secondly, that her conduct with respect to the navigation of the St. Lawrence was inconsistent with her conduct with respect to the navigation of the Mississippi. On the ground that she possessed a small tract of domain in which the Mississippi took its rise, she insisted on her right to navigate the entire volume of its waters; on the ground that she possessed both banks of the St. Lawrence where it disembogued itself into the sea, she denied to the United States the right to navigation, though about one-half of the waters of lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Superior, and the whole of Lake Michigan, through which the river flows, were the property of the United States." The question was settled by the reciprocity treaty of June 5, 1854, and later by the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, giving citizens of the United States the right to use the river subject to proper laws and regulations.

Other Rivers. — The various tolls on the river Rhine were abolished by convention in 1804, and in 1815, by the Congress of Vienna, the navigation of various other European rivers was declared to be free. In 1856, by the treaty of Paris, the same principle was applied to the Danube. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 39; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 197 and notes 116, 117. For references to other similar treaties, in regard particularly to South Amerior states, if the original property is in neither and there be no convention in regard to it, each holds to the middle of the stream.¹ But in such cases the waters of the whole river are to be considered as given to both nations for all purposes of navigation as a common highway.² Where a state which has the original proprietorship cedes the territory on one side of the river, making the river the boundary, it retains the river unless there is an express stipulation to the contrary.³

c. RIGHTS OVER SEAS. — The theory which formerly obtained that a state could by appropriation obtain predominant rights in parts of the high seas is now entirely exploded, and the rights of any nation are now restricted to a marginal belt. The extent of such belt has been regarded as extending three miles from the shore. This distance was fixed by the supposed range of a cannon, and the more recent extension of the power of artillery suggests the possible desirability of increasing this distance.⁴ The distance of one marine league from the coast has generally been recognized by the United States government in negotiations with other nations.⁵ The same position has been taken by the courts of the United States,⁶ and likewise by the courts of Great Britain and Canada.⁷

Rights Within Marginal Waters. — Within the territorial waters thus defined, fisheries are reserved to the subjects and citizens of the adjacent state exclusively, and the commission of acts of war within them constitutes a violation of the neutral rights of such state; but it is agreed that all states have a right of innocent passage through such waters by vessels other than ships of war, provided such passage is necessary or convenient for the navigation of the open sea.⁸

5. Position of United States. — In 1886 Mr. Bayard, secretary of state, wrote, "We may therefore regard it as settled * * * that, so far as concerns the eastern coast of North America, the position of this department has uniformly been that the sovereignty of the shore does not, so far as territorial authority is concerned, extend beyond three miles from low-water mark, and that the seaward boundary of this zone of territorial waters follows the coast of the mainland, extending where there are islands so as to place round such islands the same belt. This necessarily excludes the position that the seaward boundary is to be drawn from headland to headland, and makes it follow closely, at a distance of three miles, the boundary of the shore of the continent or of adjacent islands belonging to the continental sovereign. The position I here state, you must remember, was not taken by this department speculatively. It was advanced in periods when the question of peace or war hung on the decision." See 1 Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 32.

Criminal Jurisdiction. — In Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63, the defendant was prosecuted for manslaughter in so negligently managing a vessel under his charge as to cause a collision with another vessel, a passenger on which was killed thereby, the collision occurring within three miles of the English coast. While it was generally agreed by the judges that a nation has jurisdiction for certain purposes over the open sea to the extent of at least three miles, it was held by the majority of the court that without special statutory authority the criminal courts had no jurisdiction of offenses within the three-mile limit, while two judges (Kelly, C. B., and Sir R. Phillimore) held that by the principles of international law the power of a nation over the sea within three miles of its coast is only for certain limited purposes, and hence that Parliament could not apply English law within those limits. In consequence of this decision a statute (41 & 42 Vict., c. 73) was passed, giving criminal jurisdiction of offenses committed within these limits.

In U. S. v. Kessler, Baldw. (U. S.) 15, a prosecution for piracy committed on a foreign vessel, Hopkinson, J., took a view apparently similar to that of the two dissenting judges in the English case.

8. Rights Within Marginal Waters. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 42.

Straits, Gulfs, and Bays. — The rule of the marine league above referred to would give exclusive rights in straits, gulfs, or bays to the country owning the shores of the particular body of water if the mouth of such body is less than six miles wide, and not otherwise.¹ As a matter of fact, however, such waters are generally claimed as national even though the mouth be of greater breadth than six miles, provided the configuration of the coast practically severs the body of water from the sea.²

d. PROTECTORATES. — Of recent years there has been a tendency on the part of civilized nations to establish protectorates over uncivilized or half-civilized people instead of making the territory occupied by them an integral part of the protecting state. The internal government of the protected people is to a considerable extent left undisturbed in case of a protectorate, while the protecting nation assumes control as regards foreign nations, and is bound to see that reasonable security is afforded to foreign nations and subjects. Generally, also, it exercises some measure of internal control, the amount of which differs in different cases.³

e. SPHERES OF INFLUENCE. — The term "sphere of influence" has been introduced in recent years with reference to agreements made between two or more civilized powers to the effect that one alone of them shall have the right to occupy, conquer, or exercise a protectorate in a particular territory, the other parties agreeing to refrain from all political action therein. Such an agreement gives no rights to the territory as against powers not parties to the agreement, unless recognized by them as binding, and the influencing state is likely therefore to feel obliged, in order firmly to establish its rights in the particular territory, gradually to establish some actual form of government or protectorate therein.⁴

2. Sovereignty and Jurisdiction — a. GENERALLY COEXTENSIVE WITH TERRITORY. — A state has, as a general rule, absolute and exclusive jurisdiction over persons and things within its territory, and no powers within the territory of any other state.⁵

"We do not, in asserting this claim [of the three-mile limit] deny the free right of vessels of other nations to pass on peaceful errands through this zone, provided they do not, by loitering, produce uneasiness on the shore or raise a suspicion of smuggling. Nor do we hereby waive the right of the sovereign of the shore to require that armed vessels, whose projectiles, if used for practice or warfare, might strike the shore, should move beyond cannon range of the shore when engaged in artillery practice or in battle, as was insisted on by the French government at the time of the fight between the Kearsarge and the Alabama, in 1864, off the harbor of Cherbourg. We claim, also, that the sovereign of the shore has the right, on the principle of self-defense, to pursue and punish marauders on the sea to the very extent to which their guns would carry their shot, and that such sovereign has jurisdiction over crimes committed by them through such shot, although at the time of the shooting they were beyond three miles from shore." forty miles into the land, was decided to be part of Newfoundland; but this was on the ground that the legislative authority had exercised jurisdiction over it.

The mixed commission appointed under the convention of 1853 between the United States and Great Britain, to settle claims by citizens of each nation against the other, decided that the Bay of Fundy was not within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, the bay being about sixty-five miles wide and one hundred and thirty long. Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 142.

Behring Sea Award. — The United States having asserted a right to prohibit the catching of seals in the waters of Behring sea and to seize and condemn any vessels so fishing, and claims for damages caused to British ship-owners by such seizures having become the subject of controversy between Great Britain and the United States, the question was submitted to arbitration, and it was decided by the arbitrators that the United States had no such jurisdiction over the whole body of water known as Behring sea and could take measures for the protection of the seals only within the ordinary three-mile limit of marginal waters. 5. Powers limited by Territorial Limits. — Hall

b. AS AFFECTED BY NATIONALITY OR DOMICIL OF PERSON. — The exercise by a state of powers of sovereignty over all persons within its limits is, however, in practice modified to a considerable extent in the case of subjects of another state, over whom it is exercised only so far as to subject them to political and police regulations, to the criminal jurisdiction of its courts, and, as regards certain property rights, to the ordinary laws of the country, they being treated in other respects as strangers to the body politic, not owing to it the duties of a subject or entitled to the rights of one.¹ Accordingly they are generally regarded as exempt from military service, unless the existence of the state is threatened by an invasion of uncivilized people, though they may be compelled to perform duties of a strictly police character.²

How Nationality Determined. — The question what constitutes a person a subject of one state rather than another, as when a person is born in one state of parents who are subjects of another, is viewed differently by different states. In England and the United States the rule is generally that one takes the nationality of the place of his birth, while in other countries the rule is, with some modifications and exceptions, that one's nationality follows that of his parents.³

Right of Expatriation. — The right of a subject of one nation to change his nationality is a question upon which the rules of the different nations are not entirely in harmony. The question arises as a matter of international law only when the state of one's birth attempts to assert claims of sovereignty over one who has taken steps to change his nationality, as when one's native country claims military service or civil duties from him, or seeks to punish him for treason when engaged in hostilities against her. It was formerly the law of England that one could not change his allegiance, or "expatriate" himself, and such has been at times asserted to be the law of the United States:⁴ but the executive department has frequently taken a different view,⁵ and it has been declared by Congress that the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people.⁶ In Great Britain it is now provided by statute that one naturalized in a foreign country ceases to be a British subject.⁷ The rules of other nations as to the rights of their subjects to expatriate themselves vary greatly, and in view of the inconveniences and disputes liable to arise from such differences between the state of one's nativity and the state to which he has sought to transfer his allegiance, this matter has frequently been made the subject of treaty provisions.⁸

Naturalization. — Almost every nation, however indisposed to permit its subjects to transfer their allegiance to other states, receives subjects of foreign states into its own political body and gives to them generally the privileges of native subjects. The conditions of such naturalization differ greatly in the Seizure Outside of Territory. — A nation cannot make a seizure for the breach of its municipal laws within the territory of another nation. The Apollon, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 362; The Ship Richmond v. various countries. The requirements of the United States in this regard are considered elsewhere.¹

Private International Law. — If the general rule of territorial jurisdiction were rigorously applied, every state would ignore entirely the laws of foreign states in determining the private rights of individuals as between themselves. In practice, however, partly as a matter of comity and partly as a matter of convenience, a system of rules has grown up by which, in certain cases, where the individuals concerned do not belong to the same state, or where they contract in a state to which they do not belong, or assert claims to property in such a state, the law of the state to which the individual belongs is allowed to operate instead of the territorial law, or the individual is allowed to be affected by a law other than that of the state in which he resides. This system of rules is called private international law, or the conflict of laws. It is not, however, a part of international law proper, which deals only with the relations of states, or of individuals as members of the state, and is elsewhere treated in this work.²

c. AS AFFECTED BY OFFICIAL CHARACTER OF PERSON — (1) Foreign Sovereigns. — A sovereign of one country who enters another country with the knowledge and license, express or implied, of its sovereign, is universally recognized as exempt from arrest or detention, it being assumed that he does not intend to subject himself to a jurisdiction incompatible with his dignity or the dignity of his nation.³ This exemption also extends to members of his suite.⁴

(2) Diplomatic Officers. — A much more important, because more frequent, exception to the general rule giving exclusive jurisdiction to a state within its own limits occurs in the case of diplomatic representatives of a foreign state, who, with the members of their families and of their suites, are generally exempt from the local jurisdiction, either civil or criminal.⁵

(3) Foreign Troops Passing through Territory. — Permission is sometimes accorded by one nation to another for passage over the territory of the former by troops belonging to the latter.⁶ In such case there is an implied understanding that such troops shall not be subject to the local jurisdiction.⁷

d. SUBJECTS OF CIVILIZED STATES IN SEMICIVILIZED COUNTRIES. — In view of the different methods of judicial procedure existing in oriental countries from those prevailing in the most highly civilized nations, and the risk that Christians would undergo in being made subject to the native jurisdiction, treaties have very generally been made between the so-called Christian powers and such countries, by which the administration of justice, when involving the rights of a subject of a Christian nation, is reserved to the consular courts of such nation, these courts consisting of the local consul, either alone or assisted by others of his nation, with a right of appeal in some cases to the courts of his own nation.⁸

e. VESSELS ON HIGH SEAS. — Every vessel, whether public or private, is, while on the high seas, subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the nation to the practice of the more important states in this regard is fully stated.

8. Consular Courts. — See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 125; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 550 et seq. And see the title CONSULS, vol. 7, p. 17 et seq. In Egypt mixed tribunals, composed partly of natives and partly of foreigners, have been substituted for consular courts, and these tribunals have proven more satisfactory, it is which it belongs.¹ The American authorities generally regard this rule as based upon the principle that a vessel on the high seas is for legal purposes a part of the territory of the state to which it belongs.² This view, however, is combated by some writers, especially in the case of private vessels.³ The assertion of such jurisdiction over vessels as between nations has been called for most frequently in the case of crimes committed on shipboard.⁴ But in the case of persons on board of a merchant vessel who are of a nationality other than that of the vessel, claims of concurrent jurisdiction in the sovereign of such persons have also been advanced.⁵ The right to exclusive jurisdiction may also be asserted for the purpose of protecting the vessel from unfriendly acts on the part of other powers.⁶

f. VESSELS IN FOREIGN PORTS — (1) Public Vessels. — A public vessel of a state is exempt from the jurisdiction of a foreign nation within whose waters she may be found, though she is under the obligation of respecting the laws and regulations of such foreign country. The only remedy of the foreign state for an infraction of its laws is by complaint to the state to which the vessel belongs, except in extreme cases, as where the peace of the country is seriously threatened, when the vessel may properly be ordered out of the country, or, if necessary, forcibly expelled.⁷ said, than the old consular courts. See Lawrence on Int. Law, § 131; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 550 et seq.

1. Jurisdiction of Vessels on High Seas. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 106; 1 Kent's Com. 26; U. S. v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 249; Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 610; R. v. Lesley, 8 Cox C. C. 269; Chinese Cabin Waiter's Case, 13 Fed. Rep. 286.

2. Vessel Part of Territory. — It was so held in Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 610, and it has been so stated by the executive department. See Mr Webster to Lord Ashburton, Aug. 8, 1842 and Mr. Evarts to Mr. Welsh, July 11, 1879; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 33, 33a; Wharton on Conflict of Laws (2d ed.), § 356.

3. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 76; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 120.

In In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453, it was stated that although the deck of a private American vessel is considered for many purposes constructively as territory of the United States, yet persons on board of such vessels, whether officers, sailors, or passengers, cannot invoke the protection of the provisions of the constitution as to indictment and trial by jury, until brought within the actual territorial boundaries of the United States.

4. Criminal Jurisdiction. — "No principle of public law is better understood nor more universally recognized than that merchant vessels on the high seas are under the jurisdiction of the nation to which they belong, and that as to common crimes committed on such vessels while on the high seas, the competent tribunals of the vessel's nation have exclusive jurisdiction of the questions of trial and punishment of any person thus accused of the commission of a crime against its municipal laws; the nationality of the accused can have no more to do with the question of jurisdiction than it would had he committed the same crime within the geographical territorial limits of the nations against whose municipal laws he offends." Mr. Evarts, secretary of state, to Mr. Welsh. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 33a. To the same effect see Amistad's Case, 3 Op.

Atty.-Gen. 484; American Ships, 8 Op. Atty.-Gen. 73.

So in U. S. v. Davis, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 482, where a gun was fired from an American ship lying in a harbor of one of the Society Islands, killing a person on board a schooner belonging to the natives in the harbor, it was held by Judge Story that the act was, in contemplation of law, committed on board the foreign schooner where the shot took effect, and that jurisdiction of the offense belonged to the foreign government and not to the courts of the United States.

5. Claim of Concurrent Jurisdiction. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 79.

6. England's Claim to Impress Sailors. — An example of the assertion of jurisdiction for this purpose is found in the resistance by the United States, early in the century, of Great Britain's claim of right to search for and seize British sailors on American ships. See this matter fully discussed in Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 67; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law § 331.

In 1842, Mr. Webster, writing to Lord Ashburton, said: "Every merchant vessel on the seas is rightfully considered as part of the territory of the country to which it belongs. The entry, therefore, into such vessel, being neutral, by a belligerent, is an act of force, and is prima facie a wrong, a trespass, which can be justified only when done for some purpose allowed to form a sufficient jurisdiction by the law of nations." Quoted in Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 76, note.

As to Right of Search in time of war, for certain purposes, as to discover contraband or enemy's property, see infra, this title, Rights and Liabilities of Neutral Subjects — Visit and Search.

7. Public Vessels in Foreign Ports. — In The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 116, it was decided that when the public ships of war of one nation enter the ports of another friendly nation under the license implied by the absence of any prohibition or under an express stipulation by treaty, they are exempt from the local jurisdiction; and in

(2) Private Vessels. — It is generally agreed that where a merchant vessel of one country enters the port of another for the purpose of trade it subjects itself to the law of that place, unless by convention between the two countries it is otherwise agreed.¹ A practice has grown up, however, by which the government or courts of the state in which the vessel is lying refrain from exercising jurisdiction so far as this would involve an interference in the internal affairs of the vessel, provided the public peace or dignity of such country is not disturbed; and provisions in conformity with this view, excluding the foreign jurisdiction in such cases and committing jurisdiction to consuls of the state to which the vessel belongs, have frequently been incorporated in treaties.²

The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283, Story, J., said that this exemption is not founded "upon any notion that a foreign sovereign had an absolute right, in virtue of his sovereignty, to an exemption of his property from the local jurisdiction of another sovereign, when it came within his territory, for that would be to give him sovereign power beyond the limits of his own empire. But it stands upon principles of public comity and convenience, and arises from the presumed consent or license of nations, that foreign public ships coming into their ports, and demeaning themselves according to law, and in a friendly manner, shall be exempt from the local jurisdiction. But as such consent and license is implied only from the general usage of nations, it may be withdrawn upon notice at any time."

The same position has been taken by the executive. See letters referred to in Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 36.

Other than Vessels of War. — In The Parlement Belge, 5 P. D. 197, it was expressly decided that the exemption was not confined to vessels of war, but extended to any public vessel, and consequently that an unarmed packet belonging to the sovereign of a foreign state and engaged in carrying mails was not subject to process, although it also carried merchandise and passengers. See also The Thomas A. Scott, 10 L. T. N. S. 726, a case of a troop ship, in which was said that the exemption of the vessel depended "rather upon its public than its military character." As pointed out in The Parlement Belge, the exemption in the case of The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 116, was based on the fact that the vessel was public rather than that it was a vessel of war.

Service of Process. — In the opinions of Mr. Bradford and Mr. Lee, 1 Op. Atty.-Gen. 47, 87, it was stated that criminal and civil process might be served upon a person on board a foreign ship of war in a United States port; but Mr. Cushing (Belligerent Asylum, 7 Op. Atty.-Gen. 122), without referring to the previous opinions, decided the contrary in a case involving the right to release a prisoner of war on board such a foreign vessel of war by habeas corpus issuing from the United States courts.

In The Constitution, 40 L. T. N. S. 219, involving a United States vessel of war which ran ashore on the Welsh coast where salvage services were rendered to her, Sir R. Phillimore refused to allow a warrant to issue for her arrest, or for the arrest of the goods on board of her, at the salvor's suit, saying: "It is clear, upon all the authorities which are to be found in the case of The Charkieh, L. R. 4 A. & E. 59, that there is no doubt as to the general proposition that ships of war belonging to another nation with whom this government is at peace are exempt from the civil jurisdiction of the country."

1. Merchant Vessels in Foreign Port. — U. S. v. Diekelman, 92 U. S. 520; Reg. v. Cunningham, Bell Cr. Cas. 72; Reg. v. Anderson, L. R. 1 C. C. 161; Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63; 1 Phill. Int. Law (3d ed.), § 351.

In The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 144, Marshall, C. J., said: "When merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction, and the government to degradation, if such individuals or merchants did not owe temporary and local allegiance, and were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption. His subjects thus passing into foreign countries are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently there are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no one motive for requiring it. The implied license, therefore, under which they enter can never be construed to grant such exemption."

The Executive Department of the United States has generally sustained the view stated in the text. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 35a. But see the letter of Mr. Webster to Lord Ashburton, quoted in U. S. v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 264, where a general claim of jurisdiction in favor of the state to which the vessel belongs is made.

2. Comity and Treaty Stipulations. — In Willdenhus's Case, 120 U. S. 1, Waite, C. J., after stating the general rule that vessels are subject to the jurisdiction of the state in which they are, said: "From experience, however, it was found long ago that it would be beneficial to commerce if the local government would abstain from interfering with the internal discipline of the ship and the general regulation of the rights and duties of the officers and crew towards the vessel or among themselves. And so by comity it came to be generally understood among civilized nations that all matters of discipline and all things done on board which affected only the vessel or those belonging to her, and did not in-

g. PIRACY. — Acts of piracy may be punished by any nation which may capture the offender, irrespective of his nationality or that of the vessel on which the offense is committed or on which he may be found.¹

3. Measures of Constraint Short of War — a. RETORSION. — "Retorsion" is a term applied to the action of a state in treating the subjects of another state in substantially the same way in which the latter state has treated the subjects of the state using the retorsion. It is merely the application of the lex talionis to nations, and is confined to cases of the violation of mere comity or of imperfect obligations. It is perhaps most frequently practiced in the case of differential tariffs, which are met by other tariffs of a similar character.²

b. REPRISALS. — The term "reprisals" is applied to the action of a state in doing injury to another state or its subjects, generally by seizing or destroying property, in order to compensate the state making the reprisal for injuries received from the other state or to compel such state to adopt or relinquish a certain course of conduct. Reprisals are almost certain to result in war if the nation subjected thereto feels that its strength will in any way justify it in entering on hostilities.³

c. EMBARGO AND NON-INTERCOURSE. — Embargo is a form of reprisal consisting in the seizure of vessels and cargoes of another nation found in port, they being subsequently released if peace is confirmed, while if war breaks out they become liable to confiscation.⁴ In practice, however, an embargo of this character is not resorted to, the modern practice being to give to vessels of a foreign nation a certain period in which to depart after the beginning of war.⁵ Another form of embargo consists in the detention by a volve the peace or dignity of the country, or the tranquillity of the port, should be left by the local government to be dealt with by the authorities of the nation to which the vessel belonged, as the laws of that nation or the interests of its commerce should require. But if crimes are committed on board, of a character to disturb the peace and tranquillity of the country to which the vessel has been brought, the offenders have never by comity or usage been entitled to any exemption from the operation of the local laws for their punishment, if the local tribunals see fit to assert their authority." This case involved the jurisdiction of the United States courts over a homicide committed in a port of that country on board of a Belgian vessel, and it was held that this was a disorder affecting "tranquillity and public order" within a provision in a treaty with Belgium reserving to the local authorities jurisdiction of such disorders.

3. Reprisals. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 120; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 151; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 191.

In 1834, France having delayed the payment of the spoliation indebtedness, as fixed by treaty, President Jackson suggested that power to make reprisals on French property on account of this claim be given to him. A report of Mr. Clay, from the committee on foreign relations, adverts to the giving of such power to the President and contains the following remarks upon this remedy: "It is true that writers on the public law speak and treat of reprisals as a peaceful remedy, in cases which they define and limit. It is certainly a very compendious one, since the injured nation has only to authorize the seizure and sale of sufficient property of the debtor nation, or its citizens, to satisfy the debt due, and, if it quietly submit to the process, there is an end of the business. * * * It is wholly inconceivable that a powerful and chivalrous nation, like France, would submit without retaliation to the seizure of the property of her unoffending citizens, pursuing their lawful commerce, to pay a debt which the popular branch of her legislature had refused to acknowledge and provide for. * * * Retaliation would ensue, and retaliation would inevitably terminate in war. * * * Reprisals so far partake of the character of war that they are an appeal from reason to force; from negotiation, devising a remedy to be applied by the common consent of both parties, to self-redress carved out and regulated by the will of one of them; and, if resistance be made, they convey an authority to subdue it by the sacrifice of life, if necessary. The framers of our constitution have manifested their sense of the nature of this power by associating it in the same clause with grants to Congress of the power to declare war and to make rules concerning captures on land and water." 3 Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 318.

4. Embargo. — The Boedes Lust, 5 C. Rob. 246; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 152.

So in the recent war with Spain a certain number of days were allowed by the President's proclamation within which Spanish vessels nation of its own vessels in port in order to protect them from danger of capture by vessels of other nations. An embargo of this character was imposed by the United States in 1807.¹ There were numerous decisions upon the construction of this and similar laws, which are now of but little interest.² Likewise in the early part of the century non-intercourse laws were passed by Congress forbidding all commercial intercourse with England and France. These laws are now also of merely historical importance.³

d. PACIFIC BLOCKADE. — Blockade is a war measure, and as such will be considered later in this article;⁴ but during the last three-quarters of a century it has sometimes been introduced in time of peace as a measure of constraint. The practice of various nations has differed, but the later tendency is to exercise the blockade only against vessels belonging to the nation whose ports are blockaded, and to allow vessels of other states to pass freely, and it is only when thus limited in effect that its legality is admitted by statesmen and publicists.⁵

4. Amicable Settlement of Disputes — a. MEDIATION. — It is proper for a state to offer its good offices for the settlement of disputes between other nations, even when an actual state of war has arisen, but the refusal of such offer is no cause of offense. Likewise the offer may be made at the request of one or both of the disputants, and sometimes two or more nations join in making such an offer.⁶

b. ARBITRATION. — International disputes are occasionally submitted to arbitration by disinterested persons, frequently rulers of other states, and the contending parties are concluded by the decision of the arbitrators unless it is outside the terms of the submission or there is evident fraud or denial of justice.⁷

5. Intervention. — Interference by one state as between other states or in the internal affairs of another state has been of frequent occurrence and has might depart from the United States. 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 1771.

Permanent Arbitration Bureau. — In recent years the availability and desirability of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes have been much discussed, and at the peace conference at The Hague, held in 1899, to which most of the civilized nations sent representatives, a plan was adopted for the establishment of an international bureau of arbitration. According to this plan, the diplomatic representatives of the signatory powers accredited to The Hague are to form a council which shall organize and direct the bureau of arbitration. Each power is to appoint four international lawyers of character and ability, and from these lawyers the parties to any inter-been based on various pretexts. It is generally agreed that such interference is justified when the state of affairs is such as to involve immediate and pressing danger to the safety of the interfering nation. It is not, however, justified merely because danger may indirectly result from the particular form of government adopted in the other states or from the prevalence of particular ideas therein. Another ground on which such interference is said to be morally justified, although not perhaps legally admissible, is the prevention of gross acts of oppression and cruelty. Humanity has frequently been made the pretext for acts of aggressive interference, and it is generally agreed that to render it a proper ground of intervention an extraordinary state of facts must exist and the disinterestedness of the interfering state must clearly appear. In cases other than those enumerated there is no right of intervention either in the internal affairs of a state or as between two states engaged in a dispute or conflict. There may, however, occasionally be some moral excuse for interference by a number of states acting in concert for the general good when intervention by a single state would be utterly unwarranted.¹

III. MUTUAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF BELLIGERENTS—1. Definition of War.—War has been well defined as a contest between nations or states, or between parties in the same state, carried on by force of arms.²

2. Classes of War.—It is stated that a "perfect" war is one in which a whole nation is at war with another nation and all the members of both nations are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other, in every case and under every circumstance permitted by the general laws of war, while an "imperfect" war is limited as to place, persons, and things.³ Other classifications are mentioned by different writers, such as offensive and defensive, public and private, just and unjust, legal and illegal wars, but these distinctions are either obsolete in view of the changed conditions of the present day, or refer to questions of an ethical character with which international law does not concern itself.⁴

3. Commencement of War.—Though it is sometimes stated that war should be preceded by a declaration or notice to the enemy, and such was the practice national dispute will, upon notification to the bureau, be asked to choose arbitrators, and those so chosen will decide the dispute according to certain rules of procedure to be formulated. Hazell's Annual for 1900, p. 462.

1. Intervention.—Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 88 et seq.; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 45; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 389 et seq.; Woolsey on Int. Law, § 74 et seq.

2. Definition of War.—Century Dict. And see the title WAR.

3. Perfect and Imperfect Wars.—Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 296.

An imperfect or partial war was considered by the Supreme Court to exist in 1799 between France and the United States, when there were frequent conflicts between vessels of the nations mentioned, but there had been no declaration of war and France was not styled an enemy in Acts of Congress, though Congress had authorized hostilities on the high seas by certain persons in certain cases. Miller v. The Ship Resolution, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 19; Bas v. Tingy, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 37; Talbot v. Seeman, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 1. See Gray v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 340.

In Bas v. Tingy, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 37, Washington, J., said: "It may, I believe, be safely laid down that every contention by force between two nations, in external matters, under the authority of their respective governments, is not only war, but public war. If it be declared in form, it is called solemn, and is of the perfect kind, because one whole nation is at war with another whole nation; and all the members of the nation declaring war are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other, in every place and under every circumstance * * *. But hostilities may subsist between two nations, more confined in its nature and extent, being limited as to places, persons, and things; and this is more properly termed imperfect war, because not solemn, and because those who are authorized to commit hostilities act under special authority, and can go no farther than to the extent of their commission."

See generally the title WAR.

4. Other Classifications.—See 1 Halleck's Int. Law, c. 16; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 295 et seq.; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 202 et seq. See also the title WAR.

Private Wars.—In Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 160, it was said: "Whatever opinions may have prevailed formerly to the contrary, no hostilities of any kind, except in necessary self defense, can lawfully be practiced by one individual of a nation against an individual of any other nation at enmity with it, but in virtue of some public authority. War can alone be entered into by national authority; it is instituted for national purposes and directed to until the last century, this formality is not now regarded as essential, and in practice it is usually omitted. What in effect is a declaration of war is the sending of an ultimatum, involving a demand, to which a response is requested within a limited time, coupled with the intimation that a failure to reply will be considered as indicating that the state on which the demand is made desires war. As a matter of fact, in view of the modern ease of communication, an attack by one state upon another without any forewarning to the state attacked is hardly possible, and a formal notification is useless. At the beginning of a war it is the practice for the attacking nation to issue a manifesto or proclamation addressed to its subjects or to neutral nations, announcing the war and generally seeking to justify it, but this proclamation cannot be considered as intended as a notification to the enemy.¹

4. Recognition of Belligerency. — When a civil conflict exists within a state, the question arises whether the state of war shall be recognized by other nations as existing. Such recognition by a foreign government is justifiable only when necessary for the protection of its own interests, and if prematurely given can be regarded as a demonstration of sympathy with the rebellion. When the contest is of a purely internal character, entirely within the territory of the state, it is not the practice, nor is it justifiable, to recognize the insurgents as belligerents. A foreign state which is adjacent to the seat of insurrection may, however, be justified in such recognition when states not similarly situated would not be so justified. When the insurrection assumes such a form as to raise a reasonable expectation of maritime hostilities, or when acts are done at sea by one party or the other which would be acts of war if done between states, recognition of belligerency is fully justified.² The national objects; and each individual on both sides is engaged in it as a member of the society to which he belongs."

1. Commencement of War. — See Hall on Int. Law, § 123 et seq; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 333-335; Duncan v. Koster, L. R. 4 P. C. 171; People v. Smith, (U. S. Cir. Ct.) 3 Wheel. Crim. (N. Y.) 100.

There have been only eleven formal declarations of war since 1700, and during this century, before 1870, over sixty wars or acts of reprisal had been begun without formal notice. Lawrence on Int. Law, § 161, citing Maurice's Hostilities Without Declaration of War.

Wars of United States. — The war of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain was declared by Act of Congress June 18, 1812, though there had been some hostilities previously. 2 U. S. Stat. at L. 755, c. 102. And war had existed between the United States and Mexico, from March 4 until May 13, 1846, without any formal declaration, the Act of Congress of May 13, 1846, declaring that "by the act of the republic of Mexico," war existed between the countries. 9 U. S. Stat. at L. 9, c. 16. See also Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 334.

The Spanish War was to all purposes begun by the ultimatum of April 20, 1898 (30 U. S. Stat. at L. 738), requiring Spain to relinquish Cuba, and the bill passed by Congress on April 25, 1898, recognizing that war already existed by reciting "that war be and the same is hereby declared to exist, and that war has existed since the twenty-first day of April," 1898. 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 364, c. 189.

In The Buena Ventura, 87 Fed. Rep. 927, involving certain Spanish vessels seized before any actual declaration or proclamation of war with Spain, Locke, J., said: "The practice of a formal proclamation before recognizing an existing war and capturing enemy's property has fallen into disuse in modern times, and actual hostilities may determine the date of the commencement of war, although no proclamation may have been issued, no declaration made, or no action of the legislative department of the government had. This date has been declared by the Act of Congress of April 25, 1898, and by the proclamation of the President of the next day, to have been April 21, 1898, including that day, so that any Spanish property afloat, captured from that time, became liable to condemnation, unless exempt by the executive proclamation."

Civil War. — In Prize Cases, 2 Black (U. S.) 666, Grier, J., said: "A civil war is never solemnly declared; it becomes such by its accidents — the number, power, and organization of the persons who originate and carry it on. When the party in rebellion occupy and hold in a hostile manner a certain portion of territory; have declared their independence; have cast off their allegiance; have organized armies; have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents, and the contest a war." See also Dole v. Merchants' Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 51 Me. 470.

Judicial Notice is taken of the determination by the political department of the government that war exists. Cuyler v. Ferrill, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 169; Chappelle v. Olney, 1 Sawy. (U. S.) 401; Philips v. Hatch, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 571; Sutton v. Tiller, 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 593, 98 Am. Dec. 471; Smart v. Mason, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 223.

2. Recognition of Belligerency. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 15; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 5; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 213.

The courts are guided entirely by the action state of things between the insurgents and the parent state must, however, amount to a war, since the recognition is supposed to be purely of the war as a fact,¹ and the recognition should not be given unless the insurgents have a de facto political organization which is in control of a definite territory.²

Consequences of Recognition. — As a result of the recognition of belligerency, the recognizing state loses all right to complain if commissioned vessels on either side stop, search, and capture merchant vessels belonging to its subjects; nor can it object to the institution of a blockade of the insurgent ports by the parent state, and its merchant vessels likewise become subject to the rules and risks involved in carrying contraband, or dispatches, or military prisoners. On the other hand, the parent state is benefited in that it is relieved from responsibility to the foreign state for acts done by the insurgents, or in territory subject to the control of the insurgents, and it also obtains a right to exercise, as against neutral commerce, the powers of a party to a maritime war.³

Grant of Belligerent Rights by Parent State. — There may also be a recognition by the state revolted against, of a condition of belligerency arising out of the revolt. Such a recognition may be a concession made by the parent state in the interests of humanity, since it results in the treatment of the insurgents as enemies and not as rebels, or it may be made for the purpose of exempting the parent state from liability to foreign states for acts done by the insurgents or in the insurgent territory, or it may arise from a desire on the part of the parent state to enforce belligerent rights against neutrals.⁴

5. Effect of War on Treaties. — Though the outbreak of war frequently has the effect of putting an end to a treaty previously existing between the parties of the political department of the government in determining whether an insurgent party is entitled to the rights of a belligerent. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 610; The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 52; Dimond v. Petit, 2 La. Ann. 537, 46 Am. Dec. 556.

1. Existence of War as a Fact. — See letter of Mr. Fish to Mr. Motley, Sept. 25, 1869, and seventh annual message of President Grant, in Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 69. See also Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 15.

2. De Facto Organization. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 15; Rivier's Droit des Gens 213; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 163.

Instances of Recognition. — The belligerency of the South American colonies of Spain during their revolt was recognized by the United States. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 610; The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 52; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283. There was likewise recognition by the United States of the belligerency of Texas in the civil war between that province and Mexico. See letter of Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state, to the Mexican minister, Sept. 20, 1836, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 69.

Recognition of Civil War in United States. — The action of foreign nations, particularly of Great Britain, in recognizing the Confederate States as belligerents, formed at the time a constant subject of complaint by the United States government. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 15; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 69. But it is generally now recognized that these complaints were not justified. Prof. Woolsey, after referring to the secession of a number of states whose territories formed a continuous whole, their formation of a government, followed by a recognition of and preparations for a state of war, and the proclamation of blockade by President Lincoln, concludes: "The President's proclamation of blockade announced a measure which might have important international consequences. It was, in fact, a declaration of a state of war on the sea. * * * Several neutral vessels were captured between April 19 and July 13, on which last day Congress sanctioned the proceedings of the government. The validity of the captures came before the Supreme Court, and the question when the war began became a very important one. The court decided that the President had a right, jure belli, to institute a blockade of ports in the possession of the rebellious states, and that blockade was an act of war. It would seem, then, that if the British government erred in thinking that the war began as early as Mr. Lincoln's proclamation in question, they erred in company with our Supreme Court." Woolsey on Int. Law, app. 3, note 19.

3. Consequences of Recognition. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 15; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 5; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 162.

4. Grant of Belligerent Rights by Parent State. — See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 5.

Belligerent rights were accorded to the Confederate states during the civil war. Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 594.

Such a grant of belligerent rights to insurgents was made by the government of the United States of Colombia in 1885, and notification thereof was made to the government of the United States of America. See The City of Mexico, 24 Fed. Rep. 33.

This is a matter purely for the political department. Latham v. Clark, 25 Ark. 574.

to the war, this is not universally true, and if the treaty contains stipulations which contemplate a state of future war, or if it is evidently intended to set up a permanent state of things by an act done once for all, as when it contains stipulations in relation to boundaries or to the tenure of property, the treaty is revived as soon as hostilities cease.¹

Stipulations Providing for War. — The numerous provisions in treaties in reference to the methods in which war shall be carried on in case it arises between the parties to the treaty are, of course, not rescinded by the breaking out of war, but are, on the contrary, brought into effect thereby. Numerous references to such stipulations will be found in this article in the discussion of the rights of belligerents and neutrals.²

Tripartite Treaties or other treaties to which nations other than the belligerents are also parties are not generally suspended, though the war may have the effect of rendering the performance thereof for the time impossible.³

6. Effect on Intercourse of Individuals — a. IN GENERAL. — During a state of war all the subjects of one belligerent government are enemies of all the subjects of the other;⁴ and as a consequence of this principle, and because any other rule might tend to give aid to the enemy, every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse between the subjects of the belligerent powers is absolutely forbidden,⁵ and all vessels or other kinds of property engaged in trade with the enemy are subject to condemnation.⁶

1. Effect of War on Treaties. — In Society, etc., v. New Haven, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 494, Washington, J., said: "There may be treaties of such a nature, as to their object and import, as that war will put an end to them; but where treaties contemplate a permanent arrangement of territorial and other national rights, or which, in their terms, are meant to provide for the event of an intervening war, it would be against every principle of just interpretation to hold them extinguished by the event of war. If such were the law, even the treaty of 1783, so far as it fixed our limits and acknowledged our independence, would be gone, and we should have had again to struggle for both upon original revolutionary principles. Such a construction was never asserted, and would be so monstrous as to supersede all reasoning."

In Sutton v. Sutton, 1 Russ. & M. 663, upon the question whether American subjects who held land in England were to be considered in respect to such land as aliens or subjects of Great Britain, or whether the war of 1812 had terminated the treaty provisions of 1794 in that regard, the master of the rolls said: "The privileges of natives being reciprocally given, not only to the actual possessors of lands, but to their heirs and assigns, it is a reasonable construction that it was the intention of the treaty that the operation of the treaty should be permanent, and not depend upon the continuance of a state of peace."

2. Stipulations Providing for War. — See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 143; 1 Halleck's Int. Law 242; 1 Kent's Com. 176, where Chancellor Kent instances the article in the treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain which provided that in case of war between the two nations debts and choses in action should not be confiscated.

For a discussion and criticism of a contrary view advanced by some Continental writers, to the effect that war is "a relation of a state to a state, and not of an individual to an individual," see Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 18.

5. Commercial Intercourse Forbidden. — In U. S. v. Lane, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 195, Davis, J., said: "By a universally recognized principle of public law, commercial intercourse between states at war with each other is interdicted. It needs no special declaration on the part of the sovereign to accomplish this result, for it follows from the very nature of war that trading between the belligerents should cease. If commercial intercourse were allowable, it would oftentimes be used as a color for intercourse of an entirely different character; and in such a case the mischievous consequences that would ensue can be readily foreseen." See also Montgomery v. U. S., 15 Wall. (U. S.) 295; McKee v. U. S., 8 Wall. (U. S.) 163; Mitchell v. U. S., 21 Wall. (U. S.) 350; The Hiram, 1 Wheat. (U. The Domicil of the Parties to the trading, and not their situation at the time thereof, determines its legality, and accordingly it is not made legal by the fact that one goes into the enemy's country and carries it on with an enemy there.¹ And so intercourse between an alien domiciled in a country and one of its enemies is invalid.²

b. LICENSE TO TRADE. — Permission may, however, be given by the government for the carrying on of such trade, either by general relaxations of the rules of non-intercourse³ or by special licenses given to individuals, allowing such trade.⁴

Construction and Effect of License. — A license cannot generally be assigned, since the character of the grantee is taken into consideration at the time of the grant,⁵ though if the license is not granted to specific individuals, but is perfectly general in its terms, the privilege of trade which it grants can be sold.⁶ If it is granted to a particular person by name he cannot act as agent of other persons, as this would be in effect an assignment.⁷ There must be a substantial compliance with the statement of the nationality of the vessel to be used, and a vessel of the nationality of the enemy of the grantor cannot be used, unless specially authorized.⁸ Fraud on the part of the licensee subjects the cargo, as well as the vessel, to confiscation, but a small excess or small variation from the license as regards the articles carried does not have this effect.⁹ A deviation from the prescribed course entails confiscation, unless caused by stress of weather.¹⁰ Where the time in which the voyage should begin is limited by the license, the vessel must sail within that time, or at least the cargo must be on board by that time; but a requirement as to the time of arrival is construed with reference to reasonable causes of delay which may have occurred.¹¹

If the owner of the vessel belongs to one of the belligerent nations, the vessel is liable to confiscation by his government whether the trade be between ports of the enemy nation and of his own country or between the former and the ports of some foreign nation. 3. General Relaxations of Rule of Non-intercourse. — During the Crimean war, Great Britain and France permitted their subjects to trade at Russian ports in neutral vessels, and Russia permitted the import of French and English goods in neutral vessels. These were, however, recognized to be relaxations of the rule of non-intercourse which otherwise the courts of prize would have been obliged to apply. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 158.

4. Contracts Not in Course of Trade Legal. — In Kershaw v. Kelsey, 100 Mass. 561, 1 Am. Rep. 142, the prohibition of contracts between alien enemies was held to extend only to those contracts which are the fruit of commercial intercourse. In this case, Gray, J., reviewed the previous cases on the subject and summed up his conclusions as follows: "The result is that the law of nations, as judicially declared, prohibits all intercourse between citizens of the two belligerents which is inconsistent with the state of war between their countries; and that this includes any act of voluntary submission to the enemy, or receiving his protection, as well as any act or contract which tends to increase his resources, and every kind of trading or commercial dealing or intercourse, whether by transmission of money or goods, or orders for the delivery of either, between the two countries, directly or indirectly, or through the intervention of third persons or partnerships, or by contracts in any form looking to or involving such transmission, or by insurances upon trade with or by the enemy. Beyond the principle of these cases the prohibition has not been carried by judicial decision." He characterized as dicta the broader statements as to the invalidity of all contracts between alien enemies to be found in Scholefield v. Eichelberger, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 586; Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 How. (U. S.) 110; Hanger v. Abbott, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 532; The Schooner Rapid, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 304; The Julia, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 601; The Ship Emulous, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 571.

Antebellum Contracts. — Contracts made before the breaking out of war are not, as a rule, extinguished, but the remedies thereon are suspended until the close of the war, owing to the inability of an alien enemy to sue or be sued.¹ Those contracts, however, which are of such a character that their performance will necessitate the continuance of commercial intercourse during the war, such as partnership contracts, are extinguished.²

7. Enemy Character — a. OF PERSONS — (1) *Rendition of Assistance to Enemy.*³ — The enemy or neutral character of an individual is not determined exclusively by the consideration that he is or is not a subject of the enemy or of a neutral state, but depends on the question whether he renders assistance directly or indirectly to the enemy state. If he renders assistance directly by taking up a hostile attitude, there can be no question of his enemy character;³ and so it has been held that one who abandons his home, enters the military lines of his country's enemy, and is in sympathy and co-operation with such enemy is, during his stay, himself an enemy, and liable to be treated as such as to both person and property.⁴

(2) Effect of Domicil. — Apart from cases of direct assistance to the enemy, the question of domicil is controlling in determining whether one is to be considered an enemy or a neutral, the theory being that one contributes to the resources of the country in which he is domiciled, and is consequently to be considered as a subject thereof.⁵ So during the civil war persons domiciled

Statement of Rule. — In Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., 7 Cranch (U. S.) 542, Story, J., said: "Whenever a person is bona fide domiciled in a particular country, the character of the country irresistibly attaches to him. The rule has been applied with equal impartiality in favor of and against neutrals and belligerents. It is perfectly immaterial what is the trade in which the party is engaged, or whether he be within the Southern states which were in the firm possession and control of the Confederacy were considered as enemies of the United States without regard to their personal sentiments upon the questions involved in the war.¹ And the same rule was applied in the case of citizens of a neutral country domiciled in the Confederate states.² It has even been decided that a citizen of the United States who has become domiciled in a foreign country and is engaged in commerce there must be presumed to intend to continue such domicile, although war has broken out between such country and the country of his nativity.³ One's domicile is considered to determine one's enemy character, even in the case of a neutral consul resident and trading in a belligerent country.⁴

Constituents of Domicil. — Domicil has for this purpose generally the meaning of place of residence with the intention of remaining.⁵ Without any other evidence of such intention, however, a considerable length of residence may in itself be sufficient to establish domicile,⁶ and the presumption is that one engaged in any. If he be settled bona fide in a country with the intention of indefinite residence, he is, as to all foreign countries, to be deemed a subject of that country. Without doubt, in order to ascertain this domicile, it is proper to take into consideration the situation, the employment, and the character of the individual. The trade in which he is engaged, the family that he possesses, and the transitory or fixed character of his business are ingredients which may properly be weighed in deciding on the nature of an equivocal residence or domicile. But when once that domicile is fixed and ascertained, all other circumstances become immaterial."

3. Presumption of Continuance of Domicil. — The Venus, 8 Cranch (U. S.) 253, where goods belonging to an American domiciled in Great Britain were condemned as British property, though the vessel sailed before the outbreak of hostilities and before the owners had knowledge of the war. Marshall, C. J., dissented on the ground that in such a case there is a presumption of an intention on the part of an American citizen to return to his native country at the first opportunity after an outbreak of war, and that accordingly the property should be exempt from condemnation until delay or other circumstances destroy that presumption. Of this dissenting view Chancellor Kent says: "There is no doubt of its superior solidity and justice." 1 Kent's Com. 78, note c.

In The Venus, 8 Cranch (U. S.) 279, Washington, J., said: "The question whether the person to be affected by the right of domicile had sufficiently made known his intention of fixing himself permanently in the foreign country must depend upon all the circumstances of the case. If he had made no express declaration on the subject, and his secret intention is to be discovered, his acts must be attended to, as affording the most satisfactory evidence of his intention. On this ground it is that the courts of England have decided that a person who removes to a foreign country, settles himself there, and engages in the trade of the country furnishes by these acts such evidence of an intention permanently to reside there as to stamp him with the national character of the state where he resides. In questions on this subject, the chief point to be considered is the animus manendi."

6. Time of Stay. — Rogers v. The Mexican Schooner Amado, Newb. Adm. 400; The Ship Ann Green, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 274.

In The Harmony, 2 C. Rob. 322, Sir William Scott said: "I may venture to hold that time is the grand ingredient in constituting domicile. I think that hardly enough is attributed to its effects; in most cases it is unavoidably conclusive. It is not unfrequently said that if a person comes only for a special purpose, that shall not fix a domicile. This is not to be taken in an unqualified latitude. * * * Suppose a man comes into a belligerent country at or before the beginning of a war; it is certainly reasonable not to bind him too soon to an acquired character, and to allow him a fair time to disengage himself; but if he continues to reside during a good part of the war, contributing, by payment of taxes and other means, to the strength of that country, I am of opinion that he could not plead his special purpose with any effect against the rights of hostility. If he could, there would be no sufficient guard against the fraud and abuses of masked, pretended, original, and sole purposes of a long-continued residence. There is a time resident in a country is domiciled there.¹

(3) Change of Domicil. — The character acquired by mere domicil ceases upon removal from the country without the intention of returning,² and an individual is deemed to have changed his domicil to that of his native country as soon as he starts to return to that country.³ The circumstances requisite to establish domicil are, it is said, flexible and easily accommodated to the real truth and equity of the case, and so it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicil in the case of a native subject who returns to resume his original character than it does to impress the national character on a stranger.⁴ A mere occasional absence, or periodical visits to one's native country, do not change national character,⁵ nor is a mere intention to return sufficient for this purpose.⁶

(4) Master and Crew of Vessel. — The master and crew of a vessel are deemed to be possessed of the same national character as the vessel.⁷

b. OF PROPERTY — (1) In General. — An enemy character is imputed to property which does not actually belong to an enemy, if it belongs to a subject of another state who is engaged in the ordinary or extraordinary commerce of the enemy's country upon the same footing and with the same advantages as native resident subjects; his property so employed being regarded as incorporated into the general commerce of that country, and so subject to confiscation, wherever he may reside.⁸

(2) Commercial House in Enemy Country. — Accordingly the property of a commercial house established in the enemy country assumes the enemy character, without regard to the domicil of the partners.⁹ A converse rule, however, does not apply so as to render the share of an enemy in property of a house of trade in a neutral country exempt from liability as being neutral property.¹⁰ which will estop such a plea; no rule can fix the time a priori, but such a time there must be."

8. Property Incorporated in Commerce of Enemy. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 109.

In The San Jose Indiano, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 268, Story, J., said: "Such a trade, so carried on, has a direct and immediate effect in aiding the resources and revenue of the enemy and in warding off the pressure of the war. It is not distinguishable from the ordinary trade of his native subjects. It subserves his manufactures and industry; and its whole profits accumulate and circulate in his dominions, and become regular objects of taxation, in the same manner as if the trade were pursued by native subjects. There is no reason, therefore, why he who thus enjoys the protection and benefits of the enemy's country should not, in reference to such a trade, share its dangers and its losses. It would be too much to hold him entitled by a mere neutral residence to carry on a substantially hostile commerce and at the same time possess all the advantages of a neutral character. I agree, therefore, that 'it is a doctrine supported by strong principles of equity and propriety, that there is a traffic which stamps a national character on the individual, independent of that character which mere personal residence may give him.'"

(3) Products of Enemy Country. — The products of land situated in the enemy country, or in territory in the military occupation of the enemy, so long as it belongs to the owner of the soil, is considered enemy property, irrespective of his national character or residence.¹

(4) Vessels Sailing under Enemy Flag or Pass. — Ships are deemed to belong to the country under whose flag and pass they sail, as against the owner or claimant of the ship or of an interest therein.²

(5) Vessels Carrying Enemy License. — The possession by a vessel of a license from the enemy is sufficient to involve the condemnation of the vessel.³

(6) Vessels Engaged in Privileged Trade of Enemy. — Ships and other property belonging to neutrals are considered to be enemy property if engaged in a privileged trade of the enemy which is ordinarily and in times of peace confined to the subjects of the enemy, as is frequently the case with the colonial and coasting trade.⁴

(7) Agency in Enemy Country. — A neutral merchant may, in general, trade with the country of a belligerent by means of an agent stationed there without giving a belligerent character to the trade, unless he does business there as a privileged trader, in which case the general rule as to privileged trade applies.⁵

(8) Consignments to or from Belligerent Territory. — Property shipped from a neutral to the enemy country under a contract by which it is to become the property of an enemy subject, though it be agreed that it shall be at the risk of the shipper during the voyage, is regarded as enemy property.⁶ Likewise property shipped by an enemy to a neutral or friendly consignee will be treated as the property of the former unless it is clearly shown that the property has actually passed to the latter, and that the sale is subject to no conditions.⁷

In The San Jose Indiano, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 268, Story, J., said: "Although, in general, the residence of a stationed agent in the enemy's country will not affect the trade of the neutral principal with a hostile character, yet this is true only as to the ordinary trade of a neutral as such, carried on in the ordinary manner;" and distinguished the case "where such trade is carried on, not on the footing of a foreign merchant, but as a privileged trader, or by an incorporation with the general commerce of the enemy in the same manner, and with the same benefits, as a native merchant."

6. Consignment by Neutral. — The Sally Griffiths, 3 C. Rob. 300, note a; The Anna Catharina, 4 C. Rob. 107; The Ship Ann Green, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 274; The Sally Magee, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 451, affirming Blatchf. Prize Cas. 382. Compare Ludlow v. Bowne, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 1, 3 Am. Dec. 277.

"The prize courts will not allow a neutral and belligerent, by a special agreement, to change the ordinary rule of peace, by which goods ordered and delivered to the master are considered as delivered to the consignee. All such agreements, though valid in time of peace, are in time of war, or in peace if made in contemplation of war and with intent to protect from capture, held to be constructively fraudulent; and if they could operate, they would go to cover all belligerent property while passing between a belligerent and a neutral country, since the risk of capture would be laid alternately on the consignor or consignee, as the neutral factor should happen to stand in the one or the other of those relations." 1 Kent's Com. 87.

7. Consignment to Neutral. — The Aurora, 4

(9) Property in Enemy Territory. — Property within enemy territory not belonging to enemy persons is subject, like the property of enemies, to the laws of war, and, though belonging to neutrals, may be seized by the enemy if it is in any way susceptible of use for hostile purposes.¹ And so property in a belligerent state belonging to subjects of the other belligerent may, it seems, be regarded by the latter as in all respects enemy property, on the theory that it should be removed to the domicile of the owner upon the breaking out of war;² and if not promptly so removed it is subject to capture as prize of war while being subsequently brought from the enemy territory.³

(10) Transfers of Belligerent Property to Neutrals — (a) In General. — Transfers of property by belligerents to neutrals are refused recognition when made under such circumstances as to suggest that they were made for the purpose merely of protecting the property from seizure. Transfers of vessels, particularly, owing to the possibilities of fraud, are subject to careful scrutiny, and when made during war or prior to war will not be recognized if there be any conditions affecting the absolute character of the sale, or any reservation of control in the hostile proprietor.⁴ And the absence of good proof of the validity of the sale, by bill of sale and payment of a valuable consideration, will materially impair the neutral claim.⁵

(b) Transfers in Transitu. — Another application of the same principle is seen in the adoption by the prize courts of the rule that property which has a hostile character at the commencement of a voyage cannot change that character by a transfer made while it is in transit, so as to protect it from capture;⁶

So in The St. Jose Indiano, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 208, affirming 2 Gall. (U. S.) 268, it was held that where property was shipped by an enemy's house to its agent at the neutral port for account of a purchaser, the property did not vest in such purchaser so as to exempt it from seizure, the control being reserved by the shipper.

1. Property in Enemy Territory. — In Young v. U. S., 97 U. S. 60, Waite, C. J., said: "All property within enemy territory is in law enemy property, just as all persons in the same territory are enemies. A neutral owning property within the enemy's lines holds it as enemy property, subject to the laws of war; and, if it is hostile property, subject to capture. It has never been doubted that arms and munitions of war, however owned, may be seized by the conquering belligerent upon conquered territory. The reason is that if left, they may, upon a reverse of the fortunes of war, help to strengthen the adversary. To cripple him, therefore, they may be captured, if necessary; and whether necessary or not must be determined by the commanding general, unless restrained by the orders of his government, which alone is his superior. The same rule applies to all hostile property." See also Lamar v. Browne, 92 U. S. 187.

2. Belonging to Subjects of Other Belligerent. — In The William Bagaley, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 408, Clifford, J., said: "Personal property, except such as is the produce of the hostile soil, follows as a general rule the rights of the proprietor; but if it is suffered to remain in the hostile country after war breaks out, it becomes impressed with the national character of the belligerent where it is situated. Promptitude is, therefore, justly required of citizens resident in the enemy country, or having personal property there, in changing their domicile, severing those business relations, or disposing of their effects, as matter of duty to their own government and as tending to weaken the enemy."

In The Sally Magee, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 460, Swayne, J., said: "The ownership of property in such cases cannot be changed while it is in transitu. The capture clothes the captors with all the rights of the owner which subsisted at the commencement of the voyage, and anything done thereafter designed to encumber the property or change its ownership and the rule has been applied in the case of a transfer made merely in expectation of war.¹

(c) Transfers of Vessels of War. — A belligerent vessel of war cannot be sold or transferred to a neutral, even in a neutral port, so as to exempt her from seizure, however bona fide the transaction may be.²

(11) Rights of Neutral or Friendly Liens. — Equitable and secret liens on enemy property in favor of persons not enemies are not regarded as affecting its liability to condemnation, nor the rights of the captors to the proceeds;³ but liens in favor of persons in possession of the property are recognized and take precedence of the claims of the captors.⁴ In accordance with this distinction it is held that the lien of a neutral carrier for the freight of an enemy's goods is to be allowed upon capture.⁵ But seamen, it is decided, are not entitled to assert a lien for wages.⁶

(12) Withdrawal of Property from Enemy Country. — One is, it seems, allowed a reasonable time after the beginning of war in which to withdraw with his property from the enemy's country,⁷ though in the earlier cases it was stated that the right to withdraw one's property depended upon the acquirement of a license for the purpose.⁸ It has been decided, however, that a citizen cannot go or send a vessel from his own country to the enemy country for the purpose of bringing home such property, this being within the prohibition of trade with the enemy,⁹ and any right of removal must be exercised within a reasonable time.¹⁰

8. Rights of War as Against Enemy Persons — a. COMBATANTS. — In modern times it is generally conceded that a combatant is entitled to quarter if unable to continue the combat or when ready to surrender as a prisoner. He is at is a nullity. No lien created at any time by the secret convention of the parties is recognized. Sound public policy and the right administration of justice forbid it. This rule is rigidly enforced by all prize tribunals. The property was shipped to the enemy. It was diverted from its course by the capture. The allegation of a lien wears the appearance of an afterthought. It strikes us as a scheme devised under pressure, to save, if possible, something from the vortex which it was foreseen inevitably awaited the vessel and cargo."

all times liable to be taken prisoner, but as such is entitled to and generally receives humane treatment, and proper medical treatment if this is necessary and feasible. Quite frequently persons are released on their parole not to serve again during that war against the captor. The former custom of ransoming prisoners of war is now obsolete, but frequently agreements for the exchange of prisoners are made.¹

b. NONCOMBATANTS. — Noncombatants who in no way aid or take part in hostilities are now generally recognized as exempt from all direct violence or personal injury, though they are exposed to all injuries which may result indirectly from operations directed against armed forces. An important class of noncombatants consists of those whose duty it is to attend and nurse the sick and wounded of the army, and these, by the Geneva convention of 1864, acceded to by most of the civilized nations, are relieved from liability to capture and are generally entitled to the privileges of neutrals.²

9. Rights of War as Against Enemy Property — a. PROPERTY IN STATE OF CAPTOR. — It was decided by the federal Supreme Court early in the nineteenth century that property found in the United States at the outbreak of a war with the country to which the owners of the property belonged was subject to confiscation, but that the exercise of this right was a matter for the legislative department, and in the absence of an Act of Congress providing for such confiscation the property could not be judicially condemned, a mere declaration of war not being sufficient for the purpose.³ The same doctrine has been announced and applied in later cases,⁴ and the limited confiscation acts passed by Congress during the civil war were stated to be a proper exercise of belligerent rights.⁵

Practice Opposed to Confiscation. — Though the law as thus stated by the courts of the United States is generally recognized by the jurists of other nations, the exercise of the right of confiscation, except for special reasons arising from the character of the property and its particular utility to the operations of the enemy, is looked upon at the present day with decided disfavor and is not the usual practice. It is frequently provided by treaty that the right to confiscation shall not be exercised.⁶

1. Rights of War as Against Combatants. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 127; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 242 et seq.; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 347, 348; Instructions for Armies of the United States in the Field.

2. Noncombatants. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 128; 1 Rivier's Droit des Gens 242 et seq. See the articles of the Geneva convention, contained in Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 348.

3. Enemy Property in State of Captor. — Brown v. U. S., 8 Cranch (U. S.) 110.

In this case Judge Story, with the minority, held that the right of confiscation was a function of the executive department as a part of the conduct of the war and not of the legislative department; while the view of Chief Justice Marshall, with the majority of the court, was that although the right to confiscate existed, the practice of nations had so generally avoided it that an authorization of it could not be presumed from the mere declaration or recognition of war. The chief justice also referred to the provision of the Constitution enumerating the powers accompanying that of declaring war, granting the power to Congress "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water," and he went on to say that "it would be restraining this clause within narrower limits than the words themselves import to say that the power to make rules concerning captures on land and water is to be confined to captures which are extraterritorial. If it extends to rules respecting enemy property found within the territory, then we perceive an express grant to Congress of the power in question as an independent substantive power, not included in that of declaring war."

5. Confiscation Acts During Civil War. — Miller v. U. S., 11 Wall. (U. S.) 268; Tyler v. Defrees, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 331.

6. Treaty Stipulations Against Confiscation. — A list of treaties in which such provisions were inserted, including a number to which the United States were a party, will be found in Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), §§ 126, 144, notes. Of this list Mr. Hall remarks that with scarcely an exception one of the parties to each of the treaties is a South American state, and that it might be fairly argued that if similar treaties do not exist between European countries and between them and the United States it is be-

Confiscation of Debts. — The right to confiscate debts due to an enemy by persons within the jurisdiction of a belligerent power at the time of the declaration of war stands upon practically the same footing as the right to confiscate an enemy's tangible property; the right of confiscation existing, but not being usually exercised, and in the United States requiring special authority from Congress.¹

Debts Due by State. — But a strictly obligatory custom of exemption from confiscation has been established in the case of money lent by individuals to a foreign state with which their country afterwards engages in war, an exception which is undoubtedly dictated to a considerable extent by motives of self-interest, since if such loans were the subject of confiscation it would be impossible for a state to borrow except at extremely high rates of interest.²

Enemy Property Entering Territorial Waters After the Commencement of War is, however, subject to confiscation, though the present practice is not to seize vessels so entering if their voyage began before the outbreak of hostilities;³ and occasionally a practice has been made of exempting from capture shipwrecked vessels and vessels driven into port by stress of weather or want of provisions, but such practice is clearly not obligatory upon a belligerent.⁴

b. PROPERTY IN STATE OF ENEMY — (1) Public Property. — Property belonging to an enemy state is, if of a movable character, generally treated as subject to capture, but as to the right of the enemy to appropriate moneys due upon contracts by enforcing the payment of debts due to the enemy state there is some question, and while the majority of writers favor such rights of confiscation, there is strong authority to the contrary. On the other hand, lands and buildings belonging to the enemy government are not subject to capture to such an extent as to validate a title made by a sale by the captor, but a belligerent obtaining military occupation of the territory in which such land and buildings are located may make temporary use of the proceeds thereof, and he can, for instance, cut timber from state forests, but should do so with a view to the future utility of the property.⁵ Property belonging to churches, hospitals, or educational or charitable estates, is not to be considered as public property so as to be liable to confiscation;⁶ and the rule is not to seize judicial and other legal documents or archives, these being of great importance to the community and of but little utility to the invader.⁷

cause there has been for a long time little fear that the right guarded against would be exercised by well-regulated states.

During the American Civil War, the Congress of the Confederate states enacted that property of whatever nature, except public stocks and securities, held by an alien enemy should be sequestered and appropriated, and this enactment was the subject of remonstrance by Lord Russell, who said that "whatever may have been the abstract rule of the law of nations in former times, instances of its application in the manner contemplated in the Act of the Confederate Congress in modern and more civilized times are so rare and have been so generally condemned that it may almost be said to have become obsolete." Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 144, note.

The United States government likewise passed acts confiscating property actually used for insurrectionary purposes, and also property belonging to persons who aided or countenanced the Confederacy. Act of Aug. 6, 1861, 12 U. S. Stat. at L. 319; Act of July 17, 1862, 12 U. S. Stat. at L. 589. See also the titles INSURRECTION, ante, p. 977; WAR.

The case of the Silesian loan is usually referred to by writers in this connection. The controversy in that case arose from the action of the king of Prussia in seizing funds lent to him by English subjects, by way of reprisal for the capture of certain Prussian vessels by Great Britain, and the report of the law officers of England is said to show unanswerably that such right of seizure did not exist. 1 Kent's Com. 65, note a; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Property of Artistic and Educational Value. — As to whether works of art or the contents of museums or libraries are also to be regarded as exempt from appropriation there is some difference of opinion, but the most advanced view is in favor of their exemption from seizure, as having no utility for belligerent purposes.¹

(2) Private Property. — Private property is in modern times regarded as exempt from capture unless it is of such a character as to be directly useful for belligerent purposes.²

(3) Contributions and Requisitions. — But this general rule of exemption, while prohibiting unregulated plunder by the soldiery, which formerly was accompanied by much oppression and cruelty, does not prevent the exaction by the commanders of the invading forces from private individuals of sums of money, and of provisions, means of transportation, labor, or any other articles or instrumentalities which may be needed for the consumption or temporary use of such forces, these exactions being termed respectively contributions and requisitions. As the amount of these exactions is entirely within the control of the invader, they may be the means of very great oppression.³

c. PROPERTY AT SEA. — That property of the enemy is generally liable to capture at sea is conceded,⁴ the only important exception being the case of enemy cargoes in neutral vessels, which are now quite frequently treated as exempt.⁵

1. Works of Art and Contents of Museums. — Mr. Hall and Mr. Dana (Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 170) favor this view. On the other hand, the American Instructions (art. 36) assert the liability of such property to confiscation for the public use of the conquering nation. To the same effect see 2 Halleck on Int. Law 104.

Property Captured at Sea, when of this character, has been treated as exempt, but this case stands on a different footing, since the property or proceeds would go to the captors. See infra, this section, Property at Sea.

2. Private Property Generally Exempt. — U. S. v. Klein, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 123; Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 483; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 139; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 318 et seq.

In Mrs. Alexander's Cotton, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 404, Chase, C. J., said: "Being enemies' property, the cotton was liable to capture and confiscation by the adverse party. [Prize Cases, 2 Black (U. S.) 687.] It is true that this rule, as to property on land, has received very important qualifications from usage, from the reasonings of enlightened publicists, and from judicial decisions. It may now be regarded as substantially restricted 'to special cases dictated by the necessary operation of the war' [1 Kent's Com. 92], and as excluding, in general, 'the seizure of the private property of pacific persons for the sake of the gain.' [1 Kent's Com. 93.] The commanding general may determine in what special cases its more stringent application is required by military emergencies; while considerations of public policy and positive provisions of law and the general spirit of legislation must indicate the cases in which its application may be properly denied to the property of noncombatant enemies." In this case it was decided that cotton was such an element of strength to the Confederate states as to justify its confiscation, and the same holding was made in subsequent cases. U. S. v. Padelford, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 531; Sprout

v. U. S., 20 Wall. (U. S.) 459; Haycraft v. U. S., 22 Wall. (U. S.) 81; Lamar v. Browne, 92 U. S. 187; Young v. U. S., 97 U. S. 39; Ford v. Surget, 97 U. S. 594.

3. Contributions and Requisitions. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 140.

In 1846 Mr. Marcy, while secretary of war, wrote: "An invading army has unquestionably the right to draw supplies from the enemy without paying for them, and to make the enemy feel the weight of the war." In the Mexican war, however, the United States, and in the Crimean war the forces of France and England, from motives of policy, imposed no such exactions. In the Franco-German war, on the other hand, the Germans made extremely heavy demands on the inhabitants of French territory. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 140.

See as to this right of appropriation Gates v. Goodloe, 101 U. S. 672; Taylor v. Nashville, etc., R. Co., 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 646, 98 Am. Dec. 474; Wellman v. Wickerman, 44 Mo. 484.

The American Instructions for Armies in the Field (art. 37), after stating that "the United States acknowledge and protect * * * strictly private property," provides: "This rule does not interfere with the right of the victorious invader to tax the people or their property, to levy forced loans, to billet soldiers, or to appropriate property, especially houses, land, boats or ships, and churches, for temporary and military uses."

4. Enemy Property Liable to Seizure at Sea. — 1 Kent's Com. 91; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 355 and note 171; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 147; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 342.

Suggested Exemption from Capture. — There have been, however, since the latter part of the eighteenth century, many suggestions in favor of exempting such property from capture on sea as it is now exempt on land. The United States have always taken a strong position in favor of such a rule, and the same disposition has been shown by some European governments.¹ Up to this time England, as the possessor of a great navy, has been its chief opponent, but there is now a strong sentiment in that country in its favor, in view of the greatness of its mercantile marine, and there seems reason to think that, supported as the doctrine is by nearly all the writers of the different nations, the practice in conformity with this view will greatly extend.²

Property Used for Scientific or Educational Purposes. — Vessels employed only for the purposes of discovery or science have generally been regarded as exempt from capture,³ and the same view has been taken as to property intended for educational use.⁴

1. Exemption of Private Property at Sea. — As early as 1785 this position was taken by the United States, and was embodied in the Franklin treaty with Prussia of that year. In 1823 John Q. Adams, as secretary of state, proposed to all the leading European states to abolish by treaty the capture of private property at sea, but the proposition was never acted upon so as to bind the United States, except in cases of special treaty. Again, in 1856, Mr. Marcy, in refusing to accede to the Declaration of Paris abolishing privateering, stated that he would agree thereto only upon condition that "the private property of the subjects of one or the other of two belligerent powers should not be subject to capture by the vessels of the other party, except in cases of contraband of war." In 1870 Mr. Fish, in acknowledging receipt of a communication stating that in the war with France Prussia would regard French mercantile vessels as exempt from capture, expressed a hope that this principle of immunity of private property at sea would soon be universally recognized as another restraining and humanizing influence imposed by civilization upon the art of war. Whart. Dig. Int. Law, § 342. In 1871 a treaty was made with Italy embodying this principle. The same principle was observed by Austria and Prussia in the war of 1866 as between those states and as between Austria and Italy, but in 1871 Prussia changed the attitude which she had taken in favor of such exemption, owing to the failure of France to adopt it, and French mercantile vessels were accordingly subjected to capture. 3. Vessels Engaged in Discovery and Scientific Research. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), 138; 2 Hallock on Int. Law 149; The Paquete Habana, 175 U. S. 677.

4. Property Intended for Educational Use. — A collection of Italian paintings and prints captured by a British vessel during the war of 1812, on their passage from Italy to the United States, was restored to the owner, the Academy of Arts in Philadelphia, by the Vice-admiralty Court of Halifax. The Marquis de Somerueles, Stew. Adm. (Nova Scotia) 445, 482, referred to at length in The Paquete Habana, 175 U. S. 677.

So books intended for a public library in South Carolina, when captured at sea by a Fishing Vessels, used on the enemy's coasts, with their implements and supplies, cargoes and crews, when unarmed and honestly pursuing the peaceful calling of catching and bringing in fresh fish, have been, by a recent opinion of the United States Supreme Court, decided to be exempt from capture, this exemption being based "on considerations of humanity to a poor and industrious order of men, and of the mutual convenience of belligerent states."¹

Enemy Vessels in Port or Bound for Port at Beginning of War. — The practice has grown up in recent times not only of allowing an enemy's vessel which is in port at the outbreak of a war a certain time within which to depart therefrom without being made subject to capture, but likewise of permitting an enemy vessel bound for such port at the outbreak of the war to enter and discharge her cargo, and afterwards depart, without molestation while at sea or in port.²

10. Means and Mode of Carrying On War — a. LAND FORCES. — It is now generally considered that belligerent acts may be performed by bodies of men not possessing any authorization from their sovereign, provided they merely take up arms at the approach of an invading force, act under a responsible head, and comply with the laws of war. So guerilla bands or other forces not a part of the regular army may be employed, and the members thereof are entitled to the treatment accorded to other combatants, provided they are under a responsible chief and wear uniforms or other distinguishing marks of a permanent character, so as not to be able to appear as noncombatants whenever convenient.³

b. PRIVATEERS. — The use of vessels belonging to private citizens in order to carry on hostilities is forbidden by the Declaration of Paris of 1856, and the few governments which have not acceded to this convention, among which is the United States, are not likely again to utilize such instruments of warfare.⁴

c. DESTRUCTION OF LIFE AND PROPERTY. — The modern law of war regards as improper the use of any weapons or instrumentalities which are calculated to render death inevitable, or which cause suffering out of proportion to the actual crippling of the resources of the enemy. Assassination and the use of poison are likewise generally condemned. The destruction of property is forbidden unless some military end is thereby subserved, and it cannot generally be justified on the ground that the enemy will be thereby impelled to cease resistance. In the case of a siege of a fortified town, however, the bombardment of dwellings therein has, even in recent years, been regarded as a proper means of trying to compel a surrender.⁵

1. Fishing Vessels. — The Paquete Habana, 175 U. S. 677, in which case Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the majority of the court, reviewed at length the whole question of past usages in this regard and the opinions of text writers in respect thereto. The opinion of Lord Stowell in The Young Jacob, 1 C. Rob. 20, in which a fishing vessel was condemned, was distinguished as based partly on an express order of the English government directing the capture of fishing vessels and partly on evidence of fraud, besides which it was stated that what was then merely a custom or matter of courtesy might well have become, after the lapse of one hundred years, a settled rule of international law. The exemption does not extend to such vessels when employed in aid of the enemy or when their capture is necessary for war purposes, nor does it extend to "vessels employed on the high sea in taking whales, or seals, or cod, or other fish which are not brought fresh to market, but are salted or otherwise cured and made a regular article of commerce."

2. Enemy Vessels in Port or Bound for Port. — This latter practice was adopted by England in the Crimean war, by France in the German war, and by Russia in the Turkish war. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 148.

In the late war with Spain the United States, by proclamation, allowed about a month from the date at which the war began within which Spanish vessels could load cargoes and depart from American ports, and gave permission to enter and unload to any Spanish vessel which, prior to the outbreak of the war, had sailed from a foreign port to a United States port. The Buena Ventura, 87 Fed. Rep. 927.

d. DECEIT AND STRATAGEMS. — Stratagems and deceit are admissible for the purpose of gaining an advantage over the enemy, provided they do not violate certain recognized rules, which in effect constitute a tacit agreement between the belligerents. Accordingly, hospital flags or flags of truce cannot be used for purposes of deception, and a vessel using an enemy's flag must raise its own flag before opening hostilities. Similarly it is agreed that soldiers using the uniform of the enemy for purpose of deception must assume some distinctive mark before attacking.¹

e. SPIES. — It is permissible to employ persons to penetrate secretly or in disguise within the enemy's lines for the purpose of procuring information. Such a person is, however, liable to be put to death if caught. During the war with France the Prussians claimed the right to treat as spies persons passing over the German lines in balloons, but this position has been generally regarded as unsound.²

11. Military Occupation. — The military occupation of an enemy's territory results in the temporary cessation of the power of such enemy to exercise legislative or administrative control, these rights passing for the time being into the hands of the invader, to the extent necessary for the furtherance of his military operations. The invader has not generally the right to vary or suspend laws affecting property and private personal relations, or to interfere with their exercise generally, but he may impose upon the inhabitants any course of action which seems necessary for his security. Very generally acts of disobedience or hostility are made punishable with the penalty of death. Frequently the invader leaves the civil and judicial administration to some extent in the hands of the native functionaries, they being more competent to enforce the laws of the country. Until the termination of the war, the invader's occupation is regarded as merely temporary, and hence it is his duty to alter or override the existing laws as little as possible.³ The question what constitutes military occupation is one on which considerable difference of opinion has existed, the stronger states of Europe being generally in favor of the view that the mere passage of flying columns or patrols through the region will be sufficient to constitute such occupation, while the smaller states

See also Clark v. U. S., 3 Wash. (U. S.) tor.

Effect on Revenue Laws. — Upon the military occupation of a portion of the territory of the United States, that portion is to be deemed a foreign country, so far as respects the revenue laws, and goods imported during such occupation do not become liable to pay duties to the United States upon the resumption of their sovereignty over the conquered territory. U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 246; U. S. v. Hayward, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 486.

But the capture and occupation of a foreign port during war do not make such port a part of the United States, and imports from such port are still subject to duties as upon imports from foreign ports. Fleming v. Page, 9 How. (U. S.) 603.

Imposition of Duties. — The conqueror may impose duties as military contributions for the support of the military government and the army. Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. (U. S.) 190.

Effect on Character of Property. — An island in the temporary occupation of the enemy was, however, considered as an enemy's colony for the purpose of fixing the enemy character of the produce of the soil. Thirty Hogsheads Sugar v. Boyle, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 191.

Allegiance to Conquerors during a temporary occupation merely suspends former allegiance; it does not make the inhabitants aliens de facto. Shanks v. Dupont, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 242.

have opposed this view. The general theory is that the occupation should be effective, that is, the invader must have such possession as to be able to exercise its authority to the exclusion of the government of the invaded state, though in most modern wars the invading forces have claimed to exercise the rights of an occupant in a particular district upon making proclamation to that effect in any part of the district.¹

End of Occupation. — Upon the termination of the occupation of territory by an enemy, the immediate state of things existing before the hostile occupation is conceived for many purposes as having been in continuous existence, this rule being based upon what is called the right of postliminium. This rule, however, does not in general wipe out the effects of acts done by the invader which he had a right to do, such as judicial and administrative acts not of a political character, or acts done, during the belligerent occupancy, by private persons under the sanction of the municipal law; but acts which were properly done by the invader in pursuance of his right of control, while valid in so far as they have produced their effects, generally become inoperative upon the return of the legitimate government.²

12. Non-hostile Relations of Belligerents. — a. IN GENERAL. — Belligerents are from time to time brought into non-hostile relations involving a temporary cessation of hostilities, either towards particular individuals or towards the whole or part of the armed forces of the enemy.

b. ARMISTICES AND TRUCES. — Agreements for the temporary cessation of hostilities may be either for a definite time or for an indefinite time, in which latter case either belligerent should give notice before resuming hostilities. A commanding officer may conclude an armistice binding on the district over which his command extends, but his act is subject to ratification by the superior authority and its force ceases as soon as the enemy is notified of the failure to ratify it. During the armistice or truce, neither belligerent can take measures to strengthen his position which, in the absence of the agreement, the enemy would have been in a position to hinder. So the besieger of a fortified place cannot extend or advance his approaches, while the besieged cannot repair damages sustained in the attack, nor erect fresh works in places not beyond the reach of the enemy. Both parties may, however, do any acts which could not have been interfered with during the progress of hostilities, such as constructing works in places not within the enemy's reach, and the accumulation of re-enforcements and material of war. As to whether a besieged place has the right of obtaining further supplies during a truce, there is no authoritative usage, but it would seem reasonable that the besieged should obtain provisions sufficient to supply the place for the time covered by

Contracts Made by Conqueror During Occupation. — In 1871, after the re-establishment of the French government over territory previously under German control, it was asserted by the French government and conceded by the German government that contracts made by the latter government for felling timber in state forests in France ceased to have any operation, so that the contractors, though they had paid for the timber in advance, were not allowed to finish the removal of the timber. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 163.

In New Orleans v. Steamship Co., 20 Wall. (U. S.) 387, it was decided that a contract leasing a wharf belonging to the city made by municipal authorities appointed by the commander of the forces occupying the town, was not affected by the termination of such occupation before the end of the term fixed for the lease, the lease being fair and reasonable. The court said, however: "We do not intend to impugn the general principle that the contracts of the conqueror touching things in conquered territory lose their efficacy when his dominion ceases."

the truce. Such questions are, however, generally provided for by the terms of the truce.¹

c. CARTELS. — Cartels are a form of convention made between belligerents regulating the mode in which any intercourse between them shall take place. They cover such matters as the reception of flags of truce, the treatment of wounded and prisoners of war, and more particularly the exchange of prisoners.² The term "cartel ship" is applied to a vessel employed in the carriage of exchanged prisoners, and she is protected from capture so long as she is employed strictly within the line of that particular purpose.³

d. FLAGS OF TRUCE. — In case a belligerent wishes to enter into negotiations with the enemy, he displays a flag of truce. The bearer of such a flag cannot insist upon being admitted, and if he offers himself during the progress of an engagement, the enemy is not obliged to cease firing, and is not responsible if the bearer of the flag is accidentally killed or injured. Though the bearer is not expected to refrain from making observations or from reporting what he may learn without effort on his part, he is punishable as a spy if he abuses the flag by surreptitiously obtaining military knowledge thereunder.⁴

e. CAPITULATIONS. — A capitulation is an agreement under which a body of troops or a naval force surrenders. Such agreements vary greatly in their conditions, generally according to the extent of the power of the surrendering forces to prolong resistance. So far as they are of a strictly military character, they may be made by the officers in command of the forces concerned, but such officers cannot bind their respective governments by stipulations affecting the constitution or administration of a country or place.⁵

f. RANSOM. — Ransom is a repurchase by the original owner from the captor of property, most generally a vessel or its cargo, which has been seized as a prize. Ransoms have been prohibited in Great Britain since the beginning of the nineteenth century, as tending to relax the energies of war, and the practice is likewise forbidden by Russia, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland.⁶ Apart from positive prohibition, the practice seems to have fallen into disuse in recent wars.⁷

Mode of Effecting Ransom. — Ransom is carried into effect by the commander of the captured vessel giving to the captor a ransom bill by which he agrees that a stipulated sum shall be paid to the captor, and this acts as a safe-conduct against capture by other ships of war until arrival at a stipulated port.⁸

Suit on Ransom Bill. — When ransoms were permitted in England, the English courts refused to allow an enemy to sue on a ransom bill during the war,⁹ but this objection to suit has not obtained in other countries.¹⁰

g. PASSPORTS AND SAFE-CONDUCTS. — Permission is occasionally given to subjects of the enemy to travel in territory subject to the grantor's control. Such permission is not transferable and may be revoked at any time, even before the time specified for its termination.¹¹

13. Termination of War. — Though war may terminate by a mere cessation of hostilities, as a general rule a treaty of peace is concluded. Such a treaty places the belligerent countries once more in normal relation to each other, and this involves the cessation of acts committed only in time of war, unless, of course, there is an express reservation in the treaty of a right to do such acts. The conclusion of peace, apart from special stipulations, leaves everything in the state in which it finds it, on the principle of what is called uti possidetis; and accordingly territory in the military occupation of the enemy and movable property captured by the enemy are considered to become the absolute property of the enemy in possession, unless it is otherwise agreed. The treaty of peace binds the contracting parties from the moment of its conclusion, and that is understood to be from the day when it is signed, even though the signature is subject to ratification. It sometimes expressly provides, however, that peace shall not commence in regions remote from communication until a certain period of time sufficient for sending information thereto has elapsed; but in such a case, if the information is received before the stipulated time by the commander in a distant region from his own government, he cannot act in disregard thereof, though the stipulated time has not elapsed.¹ Though individuals are not criminal in continuing hostilities after the beginning of peace so long as they are ignorant thereof, they are, it seems, liable to be made responsible civilly in such case.² A treaty of peace in effect cancels all acts done before the war which led up thereto, though the principles involved, if not actually settled by the treaty, may be the ground of further complaints, in case of further acts giving cause therefor. Acts done during the war are also regarded as settled by the treaty, though these acts were in excess of the rights of war; and this principle applies not only to acts authorized by the government, but also to unauthorized acts committed by individuals in behalf of one of the belligerents, though quite frequently individuals are protected in that respect by a special clause in the treaty securing what is called an amnesty.³

IV. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF NEUTRAL STATES — 1. General Duty Not to Give Aid. — A neutral state is under the absolute obligation to do nothing which will aid one belligerent to the injury of the other. That it cannot furnish armed assistance in the way of troops or munitions of war is now generally regarded as involved in the very idea of neutrality, though in former times the practice of so-called neutral states was very different.⁴

Aid in Pursuance of Treaty Provisions. — Some modern writers of high authority state that a neutral state is at liberty to render aid of this character in performance of treaty engagements made before the war.⁵ The general current

1. Termination of War — Treaties of Peace. — 1 Kent's Com. 170; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 197 et seq.; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 130, 356; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, §§ 538-551.

In the case of the English ship Swincherd, which was captured by a French privateer before the end of the time fixed for the termination of hostilities in the Indian seas where the capture took place, it was decided that the fact that the latter vessel was informed on good authority that peace had been concluded did not affect the validity of the capture, since its information did not proceed directly from its own government. See 1 Kent's Com. 172, note b.

In The Legal Tender, referred to in 1 Kent's Com. 173, it was decided that a recapture by a British cruiser after the cessation of hostilities, though without knowledge thereof, was invalid, and did not affect the rights of the American capturer, since, on the principle of uti possidetis, peace gives a final title to capturers without condemnation. See also to the same effect The Schooner Sophie, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 138.

2. Liability for Wrongful Continuance of Hostilities. — 1 Kent's Com. 170.

In The Mentor, 1 C. Rob. 179, which was an American ship destroyed by a British vessel in 1783, after the cessation of hostilities, but before that fact had come to the knowledge of the vessels, it was held that the officer in command of the capturing vessel was civilly liable, though he should in justice be indemnified by his government.

3. Treaty of Peace Ends Existing Causes of Complaint. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 200; 1 Kivier's Droit des Gens 454; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 544.

4. General Duty Not to Give Aid. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 208. As late as 1785 a treaty between the United States and Prussia stipulated that neither party would furnish forces to an enemy of the other to be used against each other. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 211.

5. Aid in Pursuance of Treaty Provisions. — Bluntschli, § 759; 1 Kent's Com. 116; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 424.

In the treaty of 1778 between the United States and Great Britain.

of opinion is, however, that treaty provisions form no excuse for an obvious breach of neutrality,¹ and in practice nations no longer bind themselves in such a way as to be unable to preserve an absolute neutrality in case of war.²

2. Furnishing Munitions of War. — A neutral nation is in general bound not to furnish munitions of war to a belligerent,³ but there is no obligation upon it to prevent its subjects from doing so, and neutral subjects may freely sell at home to a belligerent purchaser or carry to a belligerent power arms and munitions of war, subject only to the possibility of their seizure as contraband while in transit.⁴

3. Loans to Belligerent States. — A neutral nation, likewise, though it cannot itself loan money to one of the belligerents,⁵ is, by the best authority, under no obligation to restrain its subjects from doing so.⁶

States and France the former accorded to the latter certain privileges as to the use of United States ports by French war vessels and privateers, which were not to be granted to the enemies of France. When war subsequently arose between France and other European powers the latter made the action of the United States in complying with these treaty provisions the ground of complaint, and these engagements were consequently the cause of much embarrassment to the Washington administration. They were subsequently annulled by the convention of 1800 with France. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 148, p. 124; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, § 425 and note 204.

3. Sales of Munitions of War. — This question was to some extent involved in the case of sales by the United States government of arms and ammunition not needed by it, which were begun before the Franco-Prussian war. After the beginning of that war large purchases were made by an agent of the French government. A committee of Congress appointed to investigate these sales reported that if the purchasers were French agents, this fact was unknown to the government, and even if it had been known, or if "Louis Napoleon or Frederick William had personally appeared at the war department to purchase arms," sales to them would have been lawful, if made in pursuance of a national policy adopted before the war. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 391. The position of the committee as to the propriety of such sales is not indorsed by European writers. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 218, note.

4. Sales by Subjects of Neutral State. — 1 Kent's Com. 142; Richardson v. Maine F. & M. Ins. Co., 6 Mass. 103, 4 Am. Dec. 92; Ex p. Chavasse, 11 Jur. N. S. 400; The Helen, L. R. 1 A. & E. 1; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283; The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514.

"Our citizens have always been free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace, does not require from them such an internal derangement in their occupations." Mr. Jefferson, secretary of state, to the British minister, May 15, 1793. A similar position has been frequently taken since by the state department. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 391.

5. Loans by Neutral Government. — The position that such loans are not permissible was taken by the United States in its instructions to the commissioners sent to Paris to negotiate a treaty with France. See 1 Kent's Com. 116, note b.

6. Loans by Neutral Individuals. — Among text writers statements that such loans are forbidden are quite frequently found, but these seem to arise from a failure to recognize the distinction between acts which may be done by a state and those which may be done by the subjects of the state. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 217; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 254.

As a matter of fact, in almost every war one or both of the parties rely upon loans made by subjects of foreign nations. During the Franco-Prussian war both parties borrowed in England. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 390.

The correct position was clearly taken by Mr. Webster in 1842 in the following language, quoted in Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 216: "As to advances and loans by individuals to the government of Texas or its citizens, the Mexican government hardly needs to be informed that there is nothing unlawful in this, so long as Texas is at peace with the United States, and that these are things which no government undertakes to restrain." Mr. Webster to Mr. Thompson, Executive Documents, 27th Cong., 1841-42.

Loans in Aid of Insurrection. — It was decided in England that a suit cannot be maintained on a loan made by residents of that country for the purpose of raising money to aid an insurrection in a foreign state which was on terms of amity with England. De Wutz v. Hendricks, 9 Moo. 586, 2 Bing. 314, 9 E. C. L. 417.

So the United States Supreme Court decided that an agreement made in the United States to raise money in aid of the Texas insurrection before the independence of Texas was acknowledged by the United States was not enforceable. In the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, in this case, there are some statements adverse to the right of a subject of a neutral state to make any loans to a belligerent, but the court expressly refrained from deciding this point, and based its opinion on the ground that so long as Texas had not been recognized by the

4. Improper Use of Neutral Territory — a. ENLISTMENTS. — A neutral government is under the obligation not to permit the enlisting of troops in its territory, and has, of course, the right to demand of a belligerent that it refrain from making such enlistments.¹ But a state is not bound to restrain its subjects from enlisting in the service of a belligerent,² unless perhaps it has reason to suspect that this is being done on a very large scale.³

b. PASSAGE OF TROOPS. — According to the most recent opinion and practice, a neutral nation has no right to allow the transit of belligerent troops across its territory,⁴ and the modern practice of neutral nations is in accordance with this view.⁵

Interning of Troops. — If, however, troops of one belligerent are driven into neutral territory, the neutral government may allow them to remain, without any breach of neutrality, provided it disarms them and retains them within its territory till the war is over. This is called "interning" the belligerent troops.⁶

c. HOSTILITIES. — That the lands and waters of a neutral state should not be made the scene of any acts of war has always been recognized, though the rights of the neutral in this respect were formerly frequently violated, especially in the case of captures in neutral waters.⁷

Excuse of Self-defense. — The only case in which such an encroachment is perhaps excusable is when it is rendered necessary for the purpose of self-defense, and then it would seem to involve an explanation and apology by the offending government.⁸

executive officers of the government as an independent state, the court could not enforce such a contract. Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. (U. S.) 38. The statement of Mr. Webster quoted above in reference to loans by United States citizens to Texas was made long after the recognition of Texan independence, which occurred in 1837.

1. Enlistment of Troops. — This position was taken by the United States government in the case of enlistment by the French minister, Genet, during Washington's administration, and at the time of the Crimean war enlistments by Great Britain were made a ground of complaint, and subsequently of the dismissal of the British minister. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, §§ 84, 395.

Enlistment of Sailors by vessels in the ports of a neutral has likewise been decided to be a breach of neutrality. The Brig Alerta v. Moran, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 359; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283.

If it can be proven that the persons enlisted were of the state under whose flag the cruiser sailed, who were transiently within the United States, the enlistment is lawful. The Estrella, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 298; La Amistad De Rues, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 385.

Captures in Neutral Waters were frequent during the Napoleonic wars. Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 208. And such violations of the neutrality of the United States were made the subject of complaint in President Jefferson's fifth annual message. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 399.

During the civil war the Florida, a Confederate cruiser, was captured in Brazilian waters by a federal man-of-war, and the United States government immediately offered a satisfactory reparation to Brazil. Subsequently, in The Florida, 101 U. S. 37, it was decided that as the United States, in whom the captured property primarily vested, disclaimed the capture in its diplomatic communications, the captors could not assert a claim for the vessel as a prize.

A claim by the United States government against Portugal on account of the capture in Portuguese waters by British vessels of an American privateer, the General Armstrong, having been submitted to the emperor of France, he decided against it on the ground that the privateer did not ask the Portuguese authorities for protection, but resisted the attack. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 399.

d. BASE OF OPERATIONS IN NEUTRAL TERRITORY. — A neutral nation is also bound not to allow its territory to be used as "a base of operations," which term has been defined as a place or station from which a land or naval force draws resources or re-enforcements, from which it sets forth on offensive expeditions, and in which it finds a refuge in case of need.¹

e. ARMING AND EQUIPPING SHIPS OF WAR. — At an early period in its existence the United States government took the position that the building, equipping, or manning of vessels of war in a neutral state was a violation of neutrality which the neutral nation was under an obligation to prevent.² This opinion of the executive, though perhaps in advance of the opinions then generally held, and certainly of the practice then current, was adopted by the courts of the United States, and it was accordingly decided that captures were illegal if made by vessels which were equipped in United States territory,³ or which there received an augmentation of their armament.⁴ But the mere replacement of guns after displacing them for the purpose of making nautical repairs is not illegal.⁵

Innocent Sales of Ships of War. — The prohibition of the equipment of armed vessels in neutral territory, however, has been held to apply only when there is an immediate hostile purpose in view, and a neutral nation is not called upon to prevent the equipment of such vessels in its territory and the subsequent sale thereof to a belligerent, either in the neutral port or in that of the purchaser.⁶

gents entered United States territory, seized an island at Niagara, and prepared to cross into Canadian territory on a schooner called the Caroline, and, to prevent such crossing, the Caroline was boarded by an English force and destroyed while within United States waters. Under remonstrance by the United States, the British government justified the invasion of neutral waters upon the ground of overwhelming and immediate necessity of self-defense, but expressed regret for the violation of American territory, and acknowledged that there should have been an immediate explanation and apology offered, and these assurances were accepted by the American government as satisfactory. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 500.

1. Base of Operations in Neutral Territory. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 221; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 250.

"A foreign sovereign who uses the hospitality of our ports as a base of operations for the purpose of sallying forth to harass our allies as well as our own citizens may be called upon for reparation." Mr. Randolph, secretary of state, to Mr. Hammond, Sept. 13, 1795, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 399.

The Treaty of Washington, in providing for the arbitration of the so-called Alabama claims, stated as one of the rules of adjudication that a neutral nation is bound "not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men." There was considerable difference of opinion as to what constitutes a "base of operations," and the opinion of the arbitrators does not clearly appear from their award. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402.

2. Arming and Equipping Ships of War — Policy of United States. — On May 15, 1793, Mr. Jefferson, while secretary of state, wrote to the British minister as follows: "The practice of commissioning, equipping, and manning vessels in our ports to cruise on any of the belligerent parties is equally and entirely disapproved, and the government will take effectual measures to prevent a repetition of it." This was in accordance with the position taken by the President and his cabinet, and the same policy was expressed at that time in other diplomatic communications by the government, and in the treasury regulations issued at the same time. Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 396; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 215.

Of this position and of the general view taken of neutral duties by Washington's administration, Mr. Hall, the foremost English writer, says (Int. Law, 4th ed., § 213): "The policy of the United States in 1793 constitutes an epoch in the development of the usages of neutrality. There can be no doubt that it was intended and believed to give effect to the obligations then incumbent upon neutrals. But it represented by far the most advanced existing opinions as to what those obligations were; and in some points it even went further than authoritative international custom has up to the present time advanced. In the main, however, it is identical with the standard of conduct which is now adopted by the community of nations."

Treaty of Washington and Geneva Award. — The duties of a neutral nation as regards the fitting out of vessels on her territory were the subject of constant controversy between the United States and Great Britain at the time of the civil war and thereafter until the matter was settled by the treaty of Washington providing for an arbitration of the claims, and by the award thereunder. The treaty stated certain rules as to the duties of a neutral nation, one of which, prohibiting a neutral nation from allowing its territory to be used as a base of operations, is stated above,¹ and another of which declared that "a neutral government is bound, first, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use."² The vagueness of the language of these rules and the extreme construction adverse to neutral powers placed on them by the arbitrators have caused them to be regarded with disfavor and have prevented their acceptance by the powers generally as guides for the future conduct of neutral states, but they no doubt express in a general way what is now considered the duty of a neutral government.³

f. ARMED EXPEDITIONS ISSUING FROM NEUTRAL TERRITORY. — It is also the duty of a neutral state to prevent the organization in or departure from its territory of an expedition intended to wage war against a friendly nation.⁴ This, however, does not apply to the departure of unassociated individuals, though a number go together at the same time or by the same vessel.⁵

5. Belligerent Vessels in Neutral Ports — a. RIGHT TO USE PORT. — While it has generally been recognized that a vessel of war belonging to a belligerent

In The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283, Story, J., said: "There is nothing in our laws or in the law of nations that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation."

1. See supra, this section, Base of Operations in Neutral Territory.

2. Rules of Treaty of Washington. — See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402a, for a full presentation and discussion of these rules. Among the many points of difficulty which arose in construing the rules were the meaning to be given to the phrase "due diligence," and whether the latter part of the rule quoted in the text required the neutral power to detain the vessel fitted out in violation of its neutrality in case it came again to its waters.

3. General Principles Correct. — That the rules themselves, apart from the construction placed upon them by the arbitrators, correctly present in a general way the course of conduct to be followed by a neutral, see Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402a; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 263; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 406. This view gains additional strength from the fact that at the commencement of the recent war between Spain and the United States Great Britain stated the observance of these rules to be a substantial part of the duty of a neutral government. 23 L. Mag. & Rev. 385.

Position of the United States. — Though the award was in favor of the United States, in that case a belligerent nation, the extreme view taken by the arbitrators of the duties of a neutral state, if regarded as binding by the United States in case of war, would render it necessary "either to line our shores with a standing army of almost unlimited extent or to become belligerents ourselves." Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402a. See article by J. N. Pomeroy in 7 Am. Law Rev. 237.

4. Armed Expeditions. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 222; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 250. See letter of Mr. Seward to Mr. Motley, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 395a.

In Twee Gebroeders, 3 C. Rob. 162, it was held that the capture of a hostile vessel by an expedition sent out in boats from ships of war lying in neutral territory was invalid.

5. See letter of Mr. Marcy to Mr. Escalante, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 395a.

In 1870, during the Franco-Prussian war, nearly twelve hundred Frenchmen embarked at New York in two French ships to join the French army. They were not officered or in any way organized, but the vessels were laden with a large quantity of rifles and cartridges. The state department expressed the opinion that the ships could not be looked upon as intended for hostile use against Germany, the men not being in an efficient state and the arms and ammunition being proper subjects of commerce. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 222; Wiborg v. U. S., 163 U. S. 632.

On the question what constitutes a warlike expedition in violation of the United States neutrality laws see infra, this section, Neutrality Laws.

may properly be allowed to enter neutral ports and to obtain there necessary repairs of a nautical character and sufficient supplies or provisions to enable her to reach her home port,¹ the recent tendency among nations is to limit these privileges. The practice is to forbid such a vessel to leave within twenty-four hours after the departure of a vessel of the other belligerent, and neutral nations now quite generally restrict to twenty-four hours the time of the stay of a belligerent vessel, except in case of necessity.²

b. SUPPLY OF COAL. — The supply to a belligerent ship by a neutral power, of coal in quantity greater than that necessary to carry it to its nearest home port, is now generally expressly prohibited, since this article may, under modern conditions, be considered a means of aggressive action.³

c. BRINGING PRIZE INTO NEUTRAL PORT. — A belligerent may properly bring a prize into a neutral port, unless this is prohibited by the neutral state.⁴ A prohibitory policy in this regard has, however, been adopted by a number of the important powers, and the United States has frequently stated that it will not allow sales in its ports of prizes captured by foreign belligerents.⁵

6. Effect of Violation of Neutral Rights by Belligerent. — The neutral nation may demand reparation of a belligerent nation which has violated its neutrality, and this will in general consist in the restoration to its original condition of anything affected by the wrongful act, with a proper apology or expression of regret at its occurrence.⁶

Restitution of Prize. — The neutral nation will also, when able, undo the wrongful act of the belligerent, and accordingly, when property is captured in neutral waters, or when the capturing vessel has been equipped or manned in violation of neutrality, the neutral nation will, if the captured property is brought within its jurisdiction, restore the property to its original owner,⁷ though it

1. Right to Enter Port. — See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 394, and especially correspondence therein between Holland and the United States during the civil war on the right of asylum.

2. Time of Departure. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 231; 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 405; Bluntschli, § 776. The restriction of the right of stay in the neutral port to twenty-four hours was imposed by Great Britain during the American civil war, and in the late Spanish war, and by the United States as well during the Franco-Prussian war. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 231; Proclamation of the President, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402; 23 L. Mag. & Rev. 386.

3. Supply of Coal. — Such a rule was first made by Great Britain during the civil war in the United States, it being provided further that the same vessel should not obtain more than one supply of coal in British waters within three months. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 221. And during the Franco-Prussian war the United States imposed a practically similar restriction (see the President's proclamation, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 402), as did Great Britain during the war between the United States and Spain. 23 L. Mag. & Rev. 386.

The Geneva Award states that "in order to impart to any supplies of coal a character inconsistent with the second rule, prohibiting the use of neutral ports or waters as a base of naval operations for a belligerent, it is necessary that the said supplies should be connected with special circumstances of time, of persons, or of place, which may combine to give them such character." It does not appear, however, that Great Britain was held liable for the acts of any vessel solely in consequence of illegal supplies of coal. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 369.

4. Bringing Prize into Neutral Port. — Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 213; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 226; 2 Op. Atty.-Gen. 86; 7 Op. Atty.-Gen. 122. See also Moodie v. Betty Cathcart, Bee Adm. 292.

(N. Y.) 600; Moxon v. The Brigantine Fanny, 2 Pet. Adm. 309; Hollingsworth v. The Betsey, 2 Pet. Adm. 330; Reid v. Ship Vere, Bee Adm. 66.

Burden of Proof. — Where the original owner seeks for restitution in the neutral courts, upon the ground of a violation of neutrality by the captors, the burden of showing such violation is upon him. La Amistad de Rues, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 385; The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 1; The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283.

will not attempt to give damages to the injured party.¹ Restitution will not be prevented by the fact that the captured property has been condemned as prize by the court of the country of the captor,² but if the captured property is a ship, and after the capture it is furnished with a commission by the state of the captor, it will not be restored.³ The disability of a vessel fitted out in violation of neutrality to make captures, which will be recognized by the neutral nation, terminates, however, upon the end of the cruise for which the illegal preparations were made, provided the termination of the cruise is bona fide and not merely colorable.⁴

Claim by Neutral Nation in Prize Court. — The neutral nation may also present a claim in the prize court of the country of the captors, for the restitution of the vessel to the owner on the ground that the capture was effected in violation of its neutral rights, and only when presented in this way will the question be considered in that court, the individual claimant being considered to have no right to question the capture on this ground.⁵

7. Effect of Neutral State's Failure to Observe Neutrality. — The belligerent nation which has been injured by the neglect of a neutral nation to perform its duties in preventing a hostile use of its territory may also demand reparation of the neutral state. This is a matter for agreement and will generally take the form of a monetary indemnity.⁶

8. Neutrality Laws. — In 1794, in order to enable the administration of Washington to perform what it considered the obligations of the American Union as a neutral state, Congress passed the first of the neutrality laws,⁷ prohibiting the equipment of armed vessels and the enlistment of men in United States territory. Several amendatory acts were passed, and in 1818 the whole subject was codified; and this final form was the model of the British Foreign Enlistment Acts of 1819 and 1870.⁸

The Present Law declares it to be a misdemeanor for any citizen within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States to accept and exercise a commis-

2. Condemnation in Captor's State. — Chancellor Kent so states (1 Kent's Com. 121), citing The Arrogante Barcelones, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 496, and La Amistad de Rues, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 390. The former of these cases, however, merely decided that if, after the foreign condemnation, the vessel again comes into the hands of the original wrongdoer, he cannot set up such consideration in the courts of the neutral state. The latter of the cases cited does not refer to the subject.

In The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283, it was decided that where a vessel was captured in violation of the neutrality of the United States, a foreign decree of condemnation rendered after the vessel had been libeled in the United States and was in the custody of the court did not prevent restitution.

The decision of the Geneva arbitration on the Alabama claims clearly established such a liability on the part of the neutral state. In 1868 Lord Justice Bowen wrote: "Some people have hinted that the North has no rights at all in the business. The rights violated (so runs the argument) are those of the neutral only. May not the neutral do what it pleases him with his own? If this were excellent learning, it would be indifferent sense. In spite of local juriconsults, America will still be of opinion that she was very closely concerned with the uninterrupted equipment in English ports of cruisers like the Alabama." 2. Enlistment for Foreign Service. — It is not a crime to leave the country with intent to enlist in foreign military service, or to transport out of the country persons who intend so to enlist. U. S. v. Kazinski, 2 Sprague (U. S.) 7. But the crime consists in hiring persons to go abroad, such persons intending to enlist in a foreign service. U. S. v. Hertz, 3 Pittsb. Leg. J. (Pa.) 194.

3. Equipping of Vessel. — The conversion of a merchant ship into a vessel of war with hostile intention is within the statute, U. S. v. Guinet, 2 Dall. (Pa.) 321; as is the raising or lowering of gun carriages or replacing timbers, U. S. v. Grassin, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 65.

But the mere carrying on of negotiations for the sale of a vessel with the knowledge that it will be employed against a nation with which the United States are at peace, or the mere sending of a vessel to a neutral port for sale, is not a crime within the statute. U. S. v. The Steamship Meteor, (N. Y.) 3 Am. L. Rev. 173.

Intent. — It is necessary that the intent to employ the vessel in acts of hostility shall originate before the vessel leaves the United States. The City of Mexico, 24 Fed. Rep. 33, 25 Fed. Rep. 924; The Laurada, 85 Fed. Rep. 760; U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 445. In this latter case it was held that one was guilty of being knowingly concerned in fitting out or arming a vessel with intent that she be employed in the service of a foreign state, though the intent was liable to be defeated after the vessel sailed by failure to procure funds at a foreign port; but that he was not guilty if he had no fixed intent when the vessel sailed to employ her as a privateer, but only a wish to employ her if he could obtain funds on her arrival at such port.

Locus Delictum. — The fitting out or arming of the vessel need not be completed within the United States, provided that by prearrangement there, the vessel having been procured there, the fitting out or arming is to be completed after her departure. U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 445; The Meteor, (N. Y.) 1 Am. L. Rev. 401; The City of Mexico, 28 Fed. Rep. 148.

Carriage of Contraband. — The shipping or carriage of arms and munitions of war to a belligerent is not the "furnishing, fitting out, or arming" of a vessel within the statute. The Steamship Florida, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 452; The Carondelet, 37 Fed. Rep. 799; U. S. v. Trumbull, 48 Fed. Rep. 99; The Itata, 56 Fed. Rep. 505.

Employment in Service of Insurgents. — The provision of the statute against the arming of a vessel with intent that she be employed in the service of a foreign state, "or of any colony, district, or people," includes any insurgents or insurrectionary body of people acting together and conducting hostilities, though their belligerency has not been recognized. The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, reversing 78 Fed. Rep. 175.

4. Military Expedition. — A combination of a number of men with a common intent to proceed in a body to a foreign territory and engage in hostilities with others constitutes a military expedition, whether they are provided with arms or intend to secure them in transit. U. S. v. Murphy, 84 Fed. Rep. 609; U. S. v. Hart, 78 Fed. Rep. 868, affirming 84 Fed. Rep. 799.

In Wiborg v. U. S., 163 U. S. 632, it appeared that a body of men went on board a tug loaded with arms; were taken by it thirty or forty miles and out to sea; met a steamer outside the three-mile limit, by prior arrangement; boarded her with the arms and distributed the arms among themselves; drilled to some extent; were apparently officered; and then, as preconcerted, disembarked to effect an armed landing on the coast of Cuba. It was held that the jury were justified in finding this to be a military expedition or enterprise under the statute. The court, by Fuller, C. J., said: "The men and the arms and ammunition came together; the arms and ammunition were under the control of the men; the elements of the expedition were not only 'capable of proximate combination into an organized whole,' but were combined or in process of combination; there was concert of action; they had their own pilot to the common destination; they landed themselves and their munitions of war together by their own efforts. It may be that they intended to separate when they reached the insurgent headquarters, but the evidence tended to show that until that time they intended to stand together and defend themselves if necessary."

Other Provisions of the statute authorize the President to employ a proper force to prevent the violation of the act and authorize revenue officers to detain any vessel under circumstances rendering it probable that she is to be used for a hostile purpose, and also provide for the giving of bond by the owners of armed vessels about to sail that they shall not be employed in hostilities against a nation with which the United States are at peace.¹

Effect on International Rights and Liabilities.— Though these statutes have apparently been regarded by the courts as declaring what is the law of nations as to the duties of a neutral state,² such municipal statutes are not in any respect a measure of the nation's obligations to other nations as regards the enforcement of neutrality, since, on the one hand, through excessive caution, they may require individuals to refrain from any acts which might in any possible event lead to a violation of the neutrality, and on the other hand they may be ineffective for the purpose of enforcing a proper preservation of neutrality, in which case the failure of the neutral government to observe its duties as a neutral cannot be excused by defects in its own laws.³

V. RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF NEUTRAL SUBJECTS — 1. In General.— There are a number of acts, chiefly of a commercial character, which, when done by subjects of a neutral state, are considered to be to such an extent liable to interfere with the proper and effective conduct of the war as to give grounds for action by a belligerent state. This action does not, however, take the form of a demand for redress from the sovereign of the offender, but is directed against the offender himself, and generally takes the form of a confiscation of the property involved in the act complained of. In effect the neutral subject has a perfect right to do these acts, and his own state makes no effort to prevent them, but he takes the risk of interception and capture by the belligerent injured thereby, and in such case can claim no protection from his own state.⁴

2. Neutral Commerce.— By American and English jurists it has always been recognized that, apart from special convention or treaty, an enemy's goods on board a neutral ship are liable to seizure as prize of war, while the goods of a neutral found on board an enemy's vessel are not liable to seizure, this being a mere application of the general principle that war gives a right to capture the goods of an enemy and not the goods of a friend.⁵ Another theory was,

For other cases involving the question of what constitutes a military expedition within the statute, see U. S. v. Ybanez, 53 Fed. Rep. 536; U. S. v. Hughes, 75 Fed. Rep. 267; U. S. v. Pena, 69 Fed. Rep. 953.

Place of Origin and Destination.— The fact that the expedition originated in another country is immaterial, Ex p. Needham, Pet. (C. C.) 487; as is the fact that the first stage of the journey was to be merely to an island over which the United States had jurisdiction, U. S. v. Hart, 78 Fed. Rep. 868.

That the Parts of the Expedition are to be brought together outside of the United States is immaterial. U. S. v. Rand, 17 Fed. Rep. 142; U. S. v. The Mary N. Hogan, 18 Fed. Rep. 529.

Intention.— There must be not only a hostile intention, U. S. v. O'Sullivan, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,975; but also some overt or distinct act; and mere spoken or written words, though indicative of the intent, will not constitute an offense under the statute, U. S. v. Lumsden, 1 Bond (U. S.) 5.

That War Is Inevitable does not excuse the transaction, unless the prosecution of the hostile purpose is made to depend upon the event of war. Coombs's Trial of Aaron Burr 377; U. S. v. Lumsden, 1 Bond (U. S.) 5.

Transportation as Individuals.— But it is not unlawful, under the statute, for men to go as individuals by the same vessel, although that vessel also carries arms and they propose to take part in hostilities, provided only they do not go as a military expedition. U. S. v. O'Brien, 75 Fed. Rep. 900; U. S. v. Hart, 78 Fed. Rep. 868; U. S. v. Nunez, 82 Fed. Rep. 599.

The Furnishing of Transportation to such a military expedition is providing "means" for it within the statute. Wiborg v. U. S., 163 U. S. 632.

however, occasionally adopted by treaty from the middle of the seventeenth century, by which the liability of the goods to seizure was determined by the character of the vessel in which they were found, this policy being tersely expressed in the phrases "free ships, free goods," and "enemy ships, enemy goods,"¹ and the liability of neutral goods to capture in an enemy's ship became, at times, the policy of France and Spain, apart from treaty. The two propositions "free ships, free goods," and "enemy ships, enemy goods," have, however, no necessary connection, and one may be adopted without the other; and accordingly it was decided by the United States Supreme Court that where a treaty which provided that "free ships" should make "free goods" was silent as to neutral goods in an enemy's vessel, they remained exempt from seizure.²

The Declaration of the Congress of Paris, made in 1856, to which Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Sardinia, and Turkey were parties, and which has since been accepted by all civilized states with the exception of the United States, Spain, Mexico, and Venezuela, provided (art. 2): "The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war;" and (art. 3) "neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag."³ Though the United States have never become a party to this declaration, they have since then, in the civil war and likewise in the war with Spain, expressly adopted the principles of the articles, the first part of which they have always, through their executive department, sought to have incorporated in the law of nations, and the second of which has been frequently applied by the judicial department and has never been questioned by the executive.⁴ The declaration provides that it shall not be

Thomas Jefferson wrote, in 1793: "I believe it cannot be doubted but that by the general law of nations the goods of a friend found in the vessel of an enemy are free, and the goods of an enemy found in the vessel of a friend are lawful prize. It is true that sundry nations, desirous of avoiding the inconveniences of having their vessels stopped at sea, ransacked, carried into port, and detained, under pretense of having enemy's goods on board, have in many instances introduced, by their special treaties, another principle between them, that enemy bottoms shall make enemy goods and friendly bottoms friendly goods; a principle much less embarrassing to commerce, and equal to all parties in point of gain and loss." Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 342.

A Presumption Exists that goods on board an enemy's ship are the enemy's property, unless a distinctly neutral character is impressed upon them by accompanying documents. 1. Free Ships, Free Goods. — The Dutch were the first promoters of this principle, owing to their having the bulk of the carrying trade of Europe, and their desire was, by securing the adoption of this rule, to obtain security for the goods of belligerents while in Dutch vessels. To obtain the consent of belligerent nations to the adoption of such a rule, however, it was necessary at the same time to concede to belligerents the right to capture neutral goods in an enemy's vessel. Treaties involving these provisions were quite general, and the United States included them in a number of treaties, a list of which will be found in Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 256, note. See also Lawrence on Int. Law, § 266.

2. The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 388, where the question arose in regard to a treaty with Spain.

3. The Declaration of Paris was primarily the embodiment of the rules adopted by England and France during the Crimean war, those governments having recognized that since the former claimed the right to seize an enemy's goods in neutral bottoms, and the latter the right to seize neutral goods in enemy's bottoms, between them neutral commerce was likely to suffer severely. See Lawrence on Int. Law, § 267; Twiss on Belligerent Rights; Wharton Dig. Int. Law, § 342.

The Refusal of the United States to become a party to the declaration was chiefly owing to its unwillingness to agree to the first article, abolishing privateering, unless the other nations would assent to the total exemption from capture of private property though belonging to the subjects of a belligerent state. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 342, pp. 268-296.

4. Policy of United States. — The executive department of the government has always taken a most advanced position in favor of the extension of neutral rights, and has at times taken binding "except between those powers who have acceded or who shall accede to it," but in practice this has not affected the policy of the nations which were parties to it, they having given to neutrals not parties to it the benefit of its provisions, and its provisions seem likewise to be regarded as binding on the parties to it when at war with a nation not a party to it.¹

Neutral Goods in Armed Vessel of Enemy. — It has been held in the United States that a neutral owner of goods does not render them liable to seizure by the mere fact that he places them in a vessel of one of the belligerents which is so armed as to be able to resist search and capture.² A different view has been taken in England.³

Fraudulent Claim by Neutral. — Where a neutral owner of part of the property captured claims, for the purpose of deceiving the court, another part which belongs to an enemy, the neutral property will be condemned as a penalty for the fraudulent conduct.⁴

3. Contraband of War — a. DEFINITION AND GENERAL CHARACTER. — The term "contraband of war" is applied to those commodities which, as being capable of immediate use in the prosecution of hostilities, are subject to interception and seizure when found in a neutral vessel by one of the belligerents, if they are in the course of transportation to the other. As regards the question of contraband, the United States Supreme Court divides articles into three classes: the first consisting of articles manufactured, and primarily and ordinarily used, for military purposes in the time of war; the second, of articles which may be and are used for purposes of war or peace according to circumstances; and the third, of articles exclusively used for peaceful purposes. Merchandise of the first class, when destined to a belligerent country or place occupied by the army or navy of a belligerent, is always contraband, while merchandise of the second class is contraband only when actually destined for the military or naval use of a belligerent, and merchandise of the third class is never contraband, though liable to seizure for violation of blockade.⁵ This view of the question is practically that adopted by the courts and publicists of all nations, except a few of the Continental writers, who the ground that, even apart from treaty, enemy's goods in neutral ships are exempt from seizure, a position inconsistent with that taken by the judiciary in The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 388, and other cases, though at other times the executive took the same ground as the courts and merely expressed a desire to have the exemption of enemy's goods in neutral ships made a part of the law of nations. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 342, especially p. 309; Dana's Wharton's Int. Law, §§ 454-475.

During the civil war the executive made known to foreign powers its intention to observe the principles contained in the articles of the Declaration of Paris referred to in the text. Since there was no treaty or statute imposing "free ships, free goods," as a principle of adjudication, the decisions of the courts would not have been controlled thereby; but, as pointed out by Mr. Dana, in such a case the policy of the executive could be carried out by instructions to the navy not to make captures in such cases, and by directing restitution in case captures were made. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 223. The same policy was declared by the United States in the Spanish war. See the President's proclamation, 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 1770, No. 8.

1. Rights of Nations Not Parties to Declaration. — In the Franco-German war the benefit of the principles of the Declaration of Paris was given by the belligerent nations to the property of subjects of nations which were not parties to it; and at the beginning of the war in 1860 between England and France on the one hand and China on the other, the latter not a party to the declaration, each of the two former nations proclaimed its adherence to the principles of the declaration as regarded the vessels and goods of the enemy and of neutral nations. Neutral Vessels under Convoy. — A neutral vessel is not treated as subject to capture merely because it is accompanied by an armed convoy, it seems, unless such protection was taken for the purpose of resisting search. The Maria, 1 C. Rob. 340; The Elsebe, 4 C. Rob. 483; Story, J., in The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 438; 1 Kent's Com. 155. See also infra, this section, Visit and Search—Of Vessels under Convoy.

deny the doctrine of "occasional contraband," as it has been called, by which articles of the second class are contraband or the reverse according to their destination.¹

b. ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR. — In the first class of articles, which may be termed absolutely contraband, are to be included arms and munitions of war. These articles are generally susceptible of use also for peaceful purposes, as gunpowder for blasting and guns for hunting, but the right to intercept their transportation exists because of their essentially warlike character, which renders them likely to be used for belligerent purposes, or at least to increase the enemy's available means of carrying on the war. The term "munitions of war" is somewhat indefinite, but in practice it seems to cover anything the primary and ordinary use of which is military when in the enemy's possession in time of war.²

c. ARTICLES NOT INTRINSICALLY OF WARLIKE CHARACTER — (1) In General. — The questions arising as to articles not of a primarily warlike character are difficult of solution. There exists now, as formerly, very great uncertainty in this regard, and in view of the continual change which the arts of war and industry are undergoing, it would be impossible to make a detailed and final enumeration of contraband articles. The practice of nations has been generally dictated by self-interest, and the frequent specifications in treaties as to what articles are to be deemed contraband have not tended to clarify the question, since not only are the treaties of different nations divergent in this respect, but individual nations have generally pursued no consistent course in framing such specifications in treaties with different nations.³

(2) Provisions. — While generally not contraband, provisions may become so in circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war or on account of their destination, and they will be treated as such if in the course of transportation to the army or navy of the enemy, or to its ports of naval or military equipment, unless, it would seem, they are the product of the neutral country to which the vessel belongs.⁴

In The Berinuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514, it was held that articles for immediate military use in battle, such as cannon and other guns, pistols, swords, cartridges, gunpowder, and shells, are contraband; and in The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 58, artillery harness, men's army bluchers, artillery boots, and "government regulation" gray blankets were stated to belong to the first class above mentioned, that is, to be always liable to seizure when bound to an enemy's port.

United States Naval Regulations. — General Orders No. 492, issued to the navy June 30, 1898, provide that the following articles shall be contraband: Ordnance; machine guns and their appliances, and the parts thereof; armor plate, and whatever pertains to the offensive and defensive armament of naval vessels; arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass, or copper, or of any other material, such arms and instruments being specially adapted for use in war by land or sea; torpedoes and their appurtenances; cases of mines, of whatever material; engineering and transport materials, such as gun carriages, caissons, carriage boxes, campaigning forges, canteens, pontoons, ordnance stores; portable range finders; signal flags destined for naval use; ammunition and explosives of all kinds; machinery for the manufacture of arms and munitions of war; saltpetre; military accoutrements and equipments of all sorts; horses.

General Orders No. 492, issued to the navy June 30, 1898, provided that provisions shall be contraband when destined for an enemy's ship or ships, or for a place that is besieged.

Judicial Decisions. — In The Commercen, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 382, affirming 2 Gall. (U. S.) 261, barley and oats which were in the course of transportation to the English army in Spain by a vessel of Sweden, which was neutral as between Great Britain and the United States, and was an ally of Great Britain in its war against France, were treated as contraband. Three of the judges, including Marshall, C. J., dissented in this case, which involved the right of the vessel to freight, on the ground that in conveying the commodities to the English army in Spain there was no act of unneutral conduct as against the United States. As remarked by Mr. Dana (Dana's Wheaton's Int.

(3) Materials of Naval Construction. — Naval stores and materials of naval construction have been the subject of much discussion and difference of opinion.¹ The English courts have regarded them as contraband, and that is the present rule in that country.² The United States apparently regard such articles as contraband,³ though their treaties have frequently contained stipulations to the contrary.⁴ In France, such articles are not regarded as contraband.⁵

(4) Vessels. — Vessels have been confiscated as contraband of war when on the way to belligerent ports with the expectation on the part of the owner of selling them there for belligerent purposes.⁶

(5) Horses. — Horses are quite generally considered contraband, though in some treaties with South American states the United States have excluded them.⁷

(6) Coal. — The question as to the character of coal as a contraband article has become important only in recent years, and consequently the nations have not all clearly defined their positions in that regard. In 1859 and 1870, France, when engaged in war, declared it not to be contraband, and Russia has taken the same position. England, on the other hand, appears disposed to treat it as a contraband article when it is destined to a port of naval equipment or to a naval station or base of naval operations, and this is presumably the view which would be taken by the United States.⁸

Law, note 230), the case might have been regarded as one of hostile service by a neutral vessel, involving the confiscation thereof.

In The Jonge Margaretha, 1 C. Rob. 189, Sir William Scott decided that a cargo of cheeses being conveyed by a Dutch ship to Brest, which was universally recognized as a port of naval and military equipment, were contraband; while in The Frau Margaretha, 6 C. Rob. 92, he held that such articles bound for a port near Brest were not necessarily contraband, there being no ready communication except by land between the two ports. See also The Zelden Rust, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 93.

European Policy. — In the latter part of the eighteenth century England asserted the right to seize all vessels laden with provisions bound to a French port, upon the ground that there was a prospect of reducing the enemy by famine. This was a constant source of complaint by the United States, and finally it was agreed by treaty that provisions should be paid for when captured. Since then England has taken a different position, and in 1885 objected strongly to the action of France in declaring during her hostilities with China that shipments of rice for any port north of Canton were to be considered contraband, Great Britain contending that though provisions may in particular circumstances acquire a contraband character, they cannot in general be so treated. The war between France and China was shortly afterwards concluded, and hence no case of seizure under the French declaration arose. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 370; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 245.

English Admiralty Rule. — The Manual of Naval Prize Law, prepared for the British admiralty by Prof. T. E. Holland, which may be regarded to some extent as presenting the views of the English government upon the question, names naval stores as absolutely contraband, and includes therein not only masts, spars, rudders, cordage, and sail cloth, but also marine engines and the component parts thereof, including screw propellers, paddle wheels, shafts, and boilers.

The General Orders to the Navy make horses absolutely contraband.

8. Coal. — Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 244;

(7) Money. — If intended to be used in aid of belligerent operations, money may be treated as contraband.¹

(8) Cotton. — During the civil war, cotton was, it is stated, treated as contraband under certain circumstances.²

(9) Miscellaneous. — Printing presses and materials, paper, and Confederate state postage stamps, belonging to and intended for the immediate use of the Confederate government, were likewise held to be contraband.³

d. DESTINATION OF VESSEL OR GOODS. — Since the belligerent destination of the goods is the foundation of the right of seizure, this is not affected by the fact that the vessel's destination is primarily a neutral port, if this is merely a point from which the vessel is to proceed to the enemy's port.⁴

Continuous Voyages. — An extension of this idea is involved in the application to cases of contraband of the doctrine of "continuous voyages," according to which, as decided by the United States courts, articles may be seized as contraband if their ultimate destination is a hostile port, though the intention is to unload them at an intermediate neutral port and forward them in a different vessel;⁵ and an analogous principle was applied in the case of articles in a vessel bound for a neutral port, which were destined, after being unloaded, to be forwarded by land for the use of the hostile forces.⁶ Goods so sent to

United States Naval Regulations. — General Orders, No. 492, issued to the navy June 30, 1898, provide that coal shall be contraband "when destined for a station, a port of call, or a ship or ships of the enemy."

1. Money. — U. S. v. Dieckman, 92 U. S. 520. See, for a contrary position taken by the United States government, letters of Mr. Blaine, secretary of state, to Mr. Martinez, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 371.

2. Cotton. — "Cotton was useful as collateral security for loans negotiated abroad by the Confederate states government, or, as in the present case, was sold by it for cash to meet current expenses, or to purchase arms and munitions of war. Its use for such purposes was publicly proclaimed by the Confederacy, and its sale interdicted, except under regulations established by, or contract with, the Confederate government. Cotton was thus officially classed among war supplies, and as such was liable to be destroyed when found by the Federal troops, or turned to any use which the exigencies of war might dictate. * * * Cotton, in fact, was to the Confederacy as much munitions of war as powder and ball, for it furnished the chief means of obtaining those indispensables of war. In international law there could be no question as to the right of the Federal commanders to seize it as contraband of war, whether they found it on rebel territory or intercepted it on the way to the parties who were to furnish in return material aid in the form of the sinews of war, arms, or general supplies." 5. Continuous Voyages. — In The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514, articles were condemned as contraband when seized on board a neutral vessel while sailing from Bermuda to Nassau, two neutral ports, on the theory that they were shipped with the purpose of transshipping them at Nassau and sending them thence to the Southern states. The court said: "If the ulterior destination is the known inducement to the partial voyage, and the ship is engaged in the latter with a view to the former, then whatever liability may attach to the final voyage must attach to the earlier, undertaken with the same cargo and in continuity of its conveyance. Successive voyages, connected by a common plan and a common object, form a plural unit. They are links of the same chain, each identical in description with every other, and each essential to the continuous whole. The ships are planks of the same bridge, all of the same kind, and all necessary to the convenient passage of persons and property from one end to the other." See also The Stephen Hart, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 387; affirmed in 3 Wall. (U. S.) 559.

6. In The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 28, it was held that articles of a contraband nature which were on board a vessel bound for Matamoros, a port on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, were liable to seizure in view of the evidence that they were destined for the use of the rebel forces in Texas. This case was more or less considered by the English Court of Common Pleas in Hobbs v. Henning, 17 C. B. N. S. 791, 112 E. C. L. 791, an action brought by the owners of the goods condemned in the case of the Peterhoff against the underwriters, but no positive opinion was there given as to the merits of the holding of the American court, the tendency of the court's observations however, not being unfavorable to it.

The Institute of International Law in 1896 adopted a resolution recognizing the doctrine of continuous voyages as laid down by the American court. See article by J. Westlake in 15 L. Quar. Rev. 29.

Adverse View. — The American view, as presented in the above cases, is severely condemned by W. E. Hall (see Hall on Int. Law, a neutral port are not, however, liable to seizure as contraband if they are merely sent there to purchasers or for sale, though the neutral port may be a well-known market for the purchase of supplies by the belligerent, and the consignors may expect that they will ultimately reach the belligerent.¹

e. PENALTY FOR CARRYING CONTRABAND. — Articles of a contraband character are liable to confiscation,² but, by the English practice, commodities which are not necessarily contraband, and those which are the product of the exporting country, are not confiscated, the capturing belligerent forcibly purchasing them at their mercantile value, together with a reasonable profit.³ Other articles in the same vessel which belong to the owner of the contraband may also be confiscated.⁴ The vessel, however, is not, by the modern practice, subject to confiscation, but is ordinarily visited with no greater penalty than loss of time, freight, and expenses.⁵ If, however, it belongs to the owner of the contraband cargo, or if its owner is privy to the carriage of such cargo, the vessel also is liable to confiscation.⁶ The right to confiscate a vessel has also been exercised in cases of the carriage of articles which are expressly made contraband by treaty with the state to which the neutral vessel belongs,⁷ and also in case of the use of false papers and the naming of a false destination.⁸ In some treaties provision has been made allowing the neutral vessel to proceed on its way upon abandonment to the belligerent of the contraband.

4th ed., § 247, note), on the ground that the condemnation in these cases was "not for an act — for the act done was in itself innocent, and no previous act existed with which it could be connected so as to form a noxious whole — but on mere suspicion of intention to do an act." See also the doctrine of continuous voyages considered infra, this section, in connection with blockades.

3. In The Sarah Christina, 1 C. Rob. 237, Sir William Scott said: "In the practice of this court there is a relaxation which allows the carrying of these articles, being the produce of the claimant's country, as it has been deemed a harsh exercise of a belligerent right to prohibit the carriage of these articles, which constitute so considerable a part of its native produce and ordinary commerce. But in the same practice this relaxation is understood with a condition that it may be brought in, not for confiscation, but for pre-emption — no unfair compromise, as it should seem, between the belligerent's rights, founded on the necessities of self-defense, and the claims of the neutral to export his native commodities, though immediately subservient to the purposes of hostility." See also The Haabet, 2 C. Rob. 174.

The Admiralty Prize Manual, prepared by Professor Holland, provides (p. 24): "The carriage of goods conditionally contraband and of such absolutely contraband goods as are in an unmanufactured state and are the produce of the country exporting them is usually followed only by the pre-emption of such goods by the British government, which then pays freight to the vessel carrying the goods."

In The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. There must be circumstances of aggravation. The nature of the contraband articles and their importance to the belligerent, and the general features of the transaction, must be taken into consideration in determining whether the neutral owner intended or did not intend, by consenting to the transportation, to mix in the war."

In Carrington v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 8 Pet. (U. S.) 521, Story, J., said: "The belligerent has a right to require a frank and bona fide conduct on the part of neutrals, in the course of their commerce in times of war; and if the latter will make use of fraud and false papers to elude the just rights of the belligerents, and to cloak their own illegal purposes, there is no injustice in applying to them the penalty of confiscation. The taint of the fraud travels with the party and his offending instrument during the whole course of the voyage, and until the enterprise has, in the understanding of the party himself, completely terminated."

The owner's ignorance of the master's acts in using false papers does not exempt the vessel. The Ranger, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 126; The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514.

This procedure, however, is subject to the disadvantage that the captor thereby loses the use of the evidence furnished by the ship's papers and the witnesses on board the neutral ship,¹ and a distinguished authority is of the opinion that such a treaty provision could apply only when "there is a capacity in the neutral vessel to insure the captor against a claim on the goods."²

f. BEGINNING AND END OF OFFENSE. — The offense of transporting contraband is complete from the moment of quitting the port, and the liability to confiscation immediately attaches.³ This principle does not, however, impose a liability in case of capture after the belligerent destination has surrendered to the forces of the nation to which the captors belong, thus becoming a friendly port.⁴ On the other hand, when the contraband goods have been deposited at the port of destination and the subsequent voyage has thus been disconnected from the noxious articles, it has not been usual to treat the ship or cargo upon the return voyage as liable to a penalty, although the cargo may be the proceeds of the contraband.⁵ But when the vessel has been guilty of fraudulent conduct on the outward voyage, the return cargo has been held liable to seizure upon her return voyage,⁶ and so the vessel has been held liable when she proceeded to other ports after depositing the contraband articles.⁷

4. Carriage of Belligerent Despatches and Persons — a. IN GENERAL. — Somewhat analogous to the carriage of contraband, but differing in important respects therefrom, is the carriage by a neutral vessel of despatches or persons for one of the belligerent governments.⁸ In this case, as in the case of contraband, the belligerent may protect himself by forcibly stopping the trade, but the service performed by the neutral in the case of contraband is a mere trading transaction, while it is in this case actually hostile in character, and the vessel is consequently subject to confiscation in case the owner or his agent is in any way involved.⁹

b. DESPATCHES. — The prohibition of the carrying of despatches applies generally, it seems, to despatches of a public or official nature,¹⁰ but does not extend to despatches of a diplomatic character between a belligerent government and its diplomatic representative accredited to a neutral nation, since in these the neutral nation is presumably as greatly interested as the belligerent.¹¹

Knowledge and Intent. — A neutral vessel carrying despatches for either belligerent is liable to confiscation where the circumstances surrounding the despatches were such as to justify suspicion on the part of the persons in charge of the vessel as to their character,¹² and likewise where there is an attempt by the person in charge of the vessel to conceal the despatches from the captors.¹

Mails and Mail Carriers.—Neutral vessels carrying mails are not liable to a penalty because of the inclusion in the mails of belligerent despatches, since knowledge of their contents cannot be imputed to the owners of the vessels. They are, however, liable as other vessels to visit and search, and the mails may be seized if believed to contain hostile despatches. In practice there is little disposition to interfere with the free passage of the mails, and seizure would probably occur only under exceptional circumstances.²

c. PERSONS.—The liability to confiscation of a neutral vessel which is under contract for its use in the transportation of men in the service of a belligerent is independent of the question whether the contract be such as to pass the temporary control and ownership of the vessel or be merely one to convey the persons that may be placed on board by the belligerent;³ nor is the number of persons so carried on the vessel under the contract material.⁴ But the carriage of official persons while traveling purely in a private capacity at their own expense is not, it seems, within the rule.⁵

Exercise of Fraud or Restraint.—It has been decided that a vessel is not exempt from liability because the owner of the vessel was imposed upon as to the character of the persons to be transported,⁶ or even when the master was forcibly compelled to use her as a transport.⁷ These decisions are, however, the caution of the neutral master "must be proportioned to the circumstances under which such papers are received," among which circumstances are to be included the person from whom they are received and the person to whom they are addressed, and likewise the hostile or neutral character of the place at which the voyage commenced and at which the documents are to be delivered.

1. Fraudulent Concealment.—The Atalanta, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 440; The Constantia, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 461, note a.

2. Mails and Mail Carriers.—Lawrence on Int. Law, § 282; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 252.

During the civil war the United States government, at the suggestion of the British government, as a matter of comity and not of right, exempted from search public mails of neutral powers, with the proviso that this protection should not extend to "simulated mails verified by forged certificates or counterfeited seals." See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 228, p. 659. So in 1870 the French government directed its officers not to search the mails on a neutral vessel provided the government officers in charge of the mail gave proper assurances as to the character of the contents.

Various Treaties and postal conventions contain provisions looking to the exemption of mails from the usual liabilities of search and seizure. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 252.

In his proclamation at the beginning of the Spanish war the President declared that "the voyages of mail steamers are not to be interfered with except on the clearest grounds of suspicion of a violation of law in respect to contraband or blockade." 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 1770, No. 8.

3. Carriage of Belligerent Persons.—The Friendship, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 420. In this case an American vessel engaged in the carriage to France of crews of shipwrecked French men-of-war was condemned, it being apparent that their passage was paid by the French government and the men being in the service of the state, and it was likewise held immaterial that the particular transportation was not part of a specific military operation or otherwise connected with the immediate active service of the enemy.

4. The Orozembo, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 430.

5. Persons Traveling as Private Individuals.—In The Friendship, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 420, Sir William Scott said that no court had gone so far as to lay down the rule that neutral vessels could not carry a military officer of a belligerent traveling "as an ordinary passenger, as other passengers do, and at his own expense."

6. Involuntary Service.—In The Orozembo, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 430, it was said: "In cases of bona fide ignorance there may be no actual delinquency, but if the service is injurious, that will be sufficient to give the belligerent a right to prevent the thing from being done, or at least repeated, by enforcing the penalty of confiscation. If imposition has been practiced, it operates as force; and if redress in the way of indemnification is to be sought against any person, it must be against those who have, by means either of compulsion or deceit, exposed the property to danger."

7. Deception.—In The Carolina, 4 C. Rob. 256, it was decided that a Swedish vessel engaged in the French transport service was liable to condemnation, though her employment in that service was brought about by force, the court saying: "If an act of force exercised by one belligerent on a neutral ship or person is to be deemed a sufficient justification for any act done by him contrary to the known duties of the neutral character, there would be an end of any prohibition under the law of nations to carry contraband or to engage in any other hostile act."

inconsistent with a later decision by the same judge above referred to as to the liability for carrying despatches,¹ and they would very possibly not be followed at the present time.²

Diplomatic Persons. — On the same principle by which a neutral vessel is allowed to carry diplomatic despatches for a belligerent, ambassadors or diplomatic agents may be carried.³ This immunity of diplomatic agents has, however, been stated by high authority to be applicable only to an agent who has actually been received by the neutral government, and not to one merely on his way to his post.⁴

Case of the Trent. — The right of a neutral to carry diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic persons in the service of a belligerent has been extensively discussed in connection with the famous case of the Trent, the facts of which are stated in the notes below.⁵

5. Blockade. — a. DEFINITION AND GENERAL PRINCIPLES. — The term "blockade," as used in international law, means the interception by a belligerent of the right of entrance to, and, within certain limits, of departure from, a place which belongs to or is in possession of the enemy. Though the term is in itself applicable to the interception of communication by land, its use in international law is confined to the interception of communication by sea, since interception of communication on land is a result of the general power of a belligerent to prevent any passage or communication through its lines or through any district which is subject to its control, while on the sea a neutral has the same rights as a belligerent, except in so far as they are subordinated to the special needs of the latter.⁶ The object of establishing a blockade is not necessarily, or even generally, the capture of the blockaded port or por-

4. See the opinion of Sir William Scott in The Caroline, 6 C. Rob. (Reprint) 461, which did not directly involve the question. This view is adopted by Mr. Wheaton (Int. Law, § 504), and apparently favored by Mr. Dana (see Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 228, p. 651).

5. Case of the Trent. — In 1861 Messrs. Mason and Slidell, who had been appointed diplomatic agents or commissioners from the Confederate states to England and to France respectively, took passage at Havana on the passenger steamer Trent, bound for Nassau, from which latter place they intended to sail for England. While passing through the Bahama channel the vessel was boarded by the United States steamer San Jacinto, Captain Wilkes, and the commissioners were taken out of her and carried to Boston, the Trent being allowed to continue her voyage. The English government immediately demanded and obtained their release, the English and United States governments, however, differing as to the grounds for such release. Mr. Seward, secretary of state, contended that Confederate commissioners were liable to seizure as contraband of war, but agreed to their release on the ground that they and the vessel with them should have been sent in for adjudication. After their release Earl Russell sent a long despatch controverting the position of Mr. Seward that the commissioners were contraband, in view particularly of their neutral destination, and also contended that they were free from capture as being diplomatic agents. Whether they could be considered as such agents is doubtful in view of the fact that they represented a power not yet recognized by any foreign nation and they themselves had not been as yet received by the powers to which they were accredited. The predominant view among the numerous writers referring to the case is that their seizure was irregular, but there seems to be an entire absence of harmony as to the reason for this view. The importance of the case was chiefly political, and it settled nothing, unless, perhaps, as Mr. Dana says, "that a public ship, though of a nation at war, cannot take persons out of a neutral vessel at sea, whatever may be the claim of her government on those persons." See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 228; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 374; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 284; Woolsey on Int. Law, § 184; 5 Am. L. Rev. 267; Bluntschli, § 817; Marquardsen, Der Trentfall.

United States Practice. — The right to institute commercial blockades as a belligerent measure has never been contested by the United States government, though in the period prior to the civil war the government made frequent protests in its diplomatic correspondence with other nations against the system and made efforts towards their prohibition. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 361; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 232. The United States Supreme Court has likewise always recognized their validity. See McCall v. Marine Ins. Co., 8 Cranch (U. S.) 59; Olivera v. Union Ins. Co., 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 183; Prize Cases, 2 Black tion of territory, but is rather to cut off all commercial communication between the enemy and subjects of neutral powers, and thereby diminish its resources and render it less able successfully to carry on the war or resist a siege or invasion.¹

Blockade of River Partly in Neutral State. — If one bank of a river is within a neutral state, or if the upper portion of the river is so located, a blockade of the mouth of the river can be maintained only so far as is consistent with free communication with the ports or territory of the neutral state.²

b. BLOCKADE MUST BE ACTUAL AND EFFECTIVE. — It is now agreed by the publicists and courts of all nations that a valid blockade can exist only when there is a sufficient armed force present to make the blockade effective,³ and that a mere proclamation of blockade, or, as it has been called, a "paper blockade," is not binding on neutral ships.⁴

Conditions of Effectiveness. — This effectiveness is attained if the entrance to the port be watched by a force sufficient to render egress or ingress dangerous; or, in other words, sufficient to render the capture of vessels attempting to go in or come out most probable.⁵ Provided this condition of effectiveness is

(U. S.) 635; The Circassian, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 135; The Admiral, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 603; and other cases cited in this section.

1. Communications with Diplomatic Agents of neutral powers are not, it is stated, subject to interruption by blockade, unless good and sufficient reasons are given therefor. See letters of Mr. Seward to Mr. Webb, and of Mr. Fish to Mr. Kirk, Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 361.

Neutral Vessels of War are subject to a blockade as well as merchant vessels, but quite frequently special orders are given allowing their entrance into the blockaded port, as was done during the civil war in the United States and the recent war between Spain and the United States. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 233.

2. Blockade of River Partly in Neutral State. — It was decided by the United States Supreme Court that there was no authority in international law for the blockade of the Rio Grande by the United States so as to affect trade with the Mexican shore of the river. The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 54. But it was held that vessels while discharging or receiving cargo for such neutral shores were bound to keep south of the dividing line between the Mexican and United States territories, and, though releasing vessels captured north of that line, the court refused to allow their costs and expenses. The Dashing Wave, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 170; The Volant, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 179; The Science, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 179. Costs and expenses were, however, allowed when the vessel had merely drifted across the line from an anchorage south thereof. The Teresita, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 180.

3. Blockade Must Be Actual and Effective. — 1 Kent's Com. 144, 145; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 257; Halleck on Int. Law 539; The Betsey, 1 C. Rob. 93; The Mercurius, 1 C. Rob. 84; The Olinde Rodrigues, 174 U. S. 510; The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 28.

For executive correspondence in accordance with this position, see Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 361.

4. Paper Blockades. — In the wars of the first part of the nineteenth century paper blockades were instituted on a large scale by England and France, much to the injury of neutral nations, especially the United States, and that government frequently made them a subject of complaint. See 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 295; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 361.

Insurgent Ports. — The prohibition of paper blockades applies also in the case of ports which are in the hands of insurgents, the right of a nation to close its ports for police or other reasons not applying in such a case. This was recognized during the civil war, when, though Congress authorized the President to close any ports in which duties could not be collected, the blockade was treated as extending only to those ports before which there was an effective blockading squadron. A similar position had been taken by the United States in the case of the wars of independence of the South American states. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 239; Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 361.

The Declaration of Paris (April 16, 1856), which was agreed to by all the great powers with the exception of the United States, contained the following article: "Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy." This rigorous requirement has not, however, been literally applied, but the declaration has been generally construed as being directed merely against paper blockades. See note of Lord Russell to Mr. Mason, Feb. 10, 1861, quoted in the Olinde Rodrigues, 174 U. S. 510. See also Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 233.

5. Danger in Entry and Egress. — 1 Kent's Com. 145; Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 260; The Franciska, Spinks 115; The Nornen, Spinks Prize Cas. 171; The Sarah Starr, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 69.

"It is impossible to fix with any accuracy the amount of danger in entry which is necessary to preserve the validity of a blockade. It is for the prize courts of the belligerent to decide whether in a given instance a vessel captured for its breach had reason to suppose it to be nonexistent, or for the neutral government to examine, on the particular facts, whether it is proper to withhold or to withdraw recognition." Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 260, attained, the size of the blockading squadron necessary for the purpose is immaterial.¹ Nor is it material that the blockade is made effective by batteries on shore as well as by ships afloat,² or that the blockading force is at a considerable distance from the port;³ and a blockade cannot be held to be ineffective merely because the officers of a vessel seized for attempting to violate it were not able to see any blockading vessels.⁴

c. NOTICE OF BLOCKADE. — A vessel is not liable to seizure as having violated a blockade unless it has notice of the existence of the blockade.⁵ As a general rule, a government, on instituting a blockade, makes proclamation of the fact, which proclamation is communicated to foreign states, and, according to the practice of the United States and Great Britain, a vessel sailing after the blockade has thus become a matter of public knowledge is presumed to know of it, and no direct notice to it by the blockading squadron is necessary.⁶ When, however, the vessel has sailed before she could have received notice of the blockade, or there has been no public notification of the blockade, she is entitled to warning from the blockading squadron,⁷ and according to the practice of France, Italy, Spain, and Sweden, this warning is always given to a vessel although the circumstances tend to show her knowledge of the blockade.⁸

quoted with approval by the United States Supreme Court in The Olinde Rodrigues, 174 U. S. 510.

The occasional successful passage of vessels through the lines of the blockading squadron does not render the blockade ineffective, as in the case of the blockade of Charleston during the civil war, when neutral nations made no question as to the effectiveness of the blockade, though many vessels were able, owing to the conformation of the coast, to elude the blockading squadron. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 260.

In The Olinde Rodrigues, 174 U. S. 510, it was decided that the blockade of a port might be effective although there was but one blockading vessel present, provided this vessel was sufficient to render egress and ingress dangerous. In this case the question arose as to the blockade of the port of San Juan, Porto Rico, by a single armed cruiser, and the court decided that in view of her speed and her armament, which enabled her to command a circle of thirteen miles in diameter or in the course of ten minutes a circle of nineteen miles in diameter, there could be no question as to the effectiveness of the blockade. 8. Policy of Executive Department. — During the early part of the nineteenth century the executive department of the United States quite generally took the position that a warning was necessary. Such warning was provided for in numerous treaties. See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 360.

The proclamation of blockade during the civil war contained a provision that a vessel approaching a blockaded port should be warned by the commander of one of the blockading vessels and should be captured if he should again attempt to enter the blockaded port; but this provision was held by a majority of the Supreme Court to be applicable only in case the vessel was ignorant of the existence of the blockade (Prize Cases, 2 Black (U. S.) 635). Grier, J., saying that it would be absurd to warn parties who had full previous knowledge, since in that case a vessel seeking to evade the blockade might approach and retreat any number of times, and when caught her captors could merely warn her, and the same process might be repeated at every port on the blockaded countries. This construction of the proclamation was not made the subject of complaint by any neutral power. See Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 235.

8. Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 258. See 2 Rivier's Droit des Gens 296.

A Vessel Within the Blockaded Port is conclusively presumed to have notice of the existence of the blockade, in case she attempts its violation by passing out.¹

De Facto Blockades. — Blockades not made the subject of diplomatic notice to neutral governments are termed de facto blockades, and the liabilities of neutrals as for a breach thereof differ in several particulars from those existing in the case of notified blockades. The burden of proof is on a neutral ship to show that she was ignorant of a notified blockade, while the reverse is true in the case of a de facto blockade.² Furthermore, a notified blockade is to be presumed to continue until public notice of its discontinuance is given,³ and hence the act of sailing for the blockaded port is held to be a violation of the blockade,⁴ while there is no such consequence attached to sailing for a port subject to a de facto blockade.⁵

d. TERMINATION OR SUSPENSION OF BLOCKADE — (1) By Stress of Weather. — A blockade of a port is not interrupted or terminated as regards neutral vessels by the fact that the blockading squadron is temporarily driven off by stress of weather, since a blockade is almost necessarily subject to such interruptions.⁶

(2) By Pursuit of Prize. — Nor is it terminated even by the temporary absence of the blockading squadron in pursuit of a prize.⁷

(3) By Enemy's Fleet. — But the blockade ceases if the blockading vessels are driven off by the enemy's fleet, even though they speedily resume the blockade, and in such a case it is necessary that a new notification be given to neutrals.⁸

(4) By Capture of Blockaded Port. — It was decided by the United States Supreme Court, during the civil war, that the capture and occupation of a blockaded port by the forces of the blockading belligerent did not immediately terminate the blockade.⁹ This decision has been questioned by foreign publicists, and subsequently damages for a seizure were given by the commission appointed under the treaty of Washington.¹⁰

e. WHAT CONSTITUTES VIOLATION — (1) In General. — According to the decisions of the United States and Great Britain, the mere act of sailing from a neutral port with knowledge of a duly notified blockade, and with intent to enter the blockaded port, renders the vessel liable to capture as for a violation

7. Interruption by Pursuit of Prize. — In 1861 the Niagara, which was blockading Charleston, having been sent away to intercept a cargo of arms expected at another part of the coast, the harbor remained open for at least five days, and the British government assumed that there was a suspension of the blockade; but the United States refused to admit this contention. This decision seems to be to some extent at least in conflict with Thirty Hogsheads Sugar v. Boyle, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 195, where it was held that for belligerent purposes an acquisition made during war becomes part of the domain of the conqueror. In the later case the court dwelt upon the statement of Lord Stowell that a notified blockade is presumed to continue until publicly discontinued, but this statement was made with reference merely to the duty of a neutral vessel to act on such presumption by not sailing for a port which it knows to be blockaded.

The Proclamation revoking the blockade of New Orleans was held not to terminate the blockade of the adjoining coast remaining under hostile control. The Baigorri, 2 Wall. (U. S.) 474; The Josephine, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 83.

of the blockade,¹ and the fact that there is an intention to go in the first place to an intermediate neutral port is immaterial.² But the mere act of sailing for a blockaded port is not an offense where there is no intention of breaking the blockade, the purpose being to find out as to the existence of the blockade by inquiry at a neutral port.³

(2) Approach for Inquiry or to Procure License. — The vessel cannot leave the ascertainment of the question whether the blockade is still existing, to the time of her arrival at the blockaded port, and claim that her approach thereto was for the purpose of inquiry,⁴ nor can it approach the blockaded port for the purpose of procuring a license to enter from the blockading fleet.⁵

(3) Egress from Blockaded Port. — The act of egress from a blockaded port is as much a violation of the blockade as the act of ingress.⁶ A vessel in the blockaded port at the time of the commencement of the blockade is, however, permitted to issue therefrom with a cargo shipped before the blockade commenced,⁷ but she cannot carry out cargo shipped after the commencement of the blockade.⁸

A Period of Time, usually fifteen days, is generally fixed within which a vessel may so pass out, though occasionally greater time is allowed in view of difficulties of egress from the particular port.⁹

In The Cheshire, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 231, affirming Blatchf. Prize Cas. 151, 643, Field, J., said: "If approach for inquiry were permissible it will be readily seen that the greatest facilities would be afforded to elude the blockade; the liberty of inquiry would be a license to attempt to enter the blockaded port; and that information was sought would be the plea in every case of seizure. With a liberty of this kind the difficulty of enforcing an efficient blockade would be greatly augmented." See, however, the opinion of Nelson, J., in The Empress, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 659, in which such approach for inquiry was held to be justifiable. See also The Delta, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 654; The Forest King, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 45.

Vessel Admitted into Port. — A vessel which is allowed by the blockading squadron to enter a port has the right to presume that she will be permitted to leave the port, and does not violate the blockade in attempting so to do. The Juffrow Maria Schroeder, 3 C. Rob. 160.

Transfer to Lighters. — In The Otto, Spinks 257, it was decided that a cargo which had been bona fide placed on board the vessel might be partially transferred to lighters for purposes of navigation and reshipped outside. See also Oldden v. McChesney, 5 S. & R. (Pa.) 71.

9. Time Given for Departure. — Fifteen days

(4) Case of Necessity. — A vessel may enter a blockaded port in case of extreme necessity, when in search of repairs, supplies, or shelter; but allegations of such necessity are regarded with distrust, and satisfactory evidence of the urgency of the necessity is requisite.¹ A vessel so justified in entering the port has the right to issue again, provided her cargo remains unchanged.²

(5) Ultimate Destination of Cargo. — During the civil war, the Supreme Court of the United States extended the theory of blockade so far as to hold that a belligerent can seize and condemn for blockade breaking the cargo of a vessel on its way from one neutral port to another, if there be evidence that the cargo, after being unloaded at the neutral port to which it is being carried, is intended to be transported by sea to a blockaded port, it being held that the voyage between the neutral ports and the subsequent voyage from the second neutral port to the blockaded port constitute one and the same illegal voyage.³ This decision, however, has been very generally condemned by foreign writers, and it is perhaps questionable whether it would be followed in another case.⁴

Inland Conveyance of Goods. — But it was decided by the same court that such a violation did not result when it was intended that the goods, after delivery at a neutral port, should be carried to a blockaded port by inland conveyance;⁵

were given by Great Britain and France in the Crimean war and by the United States in the civil war. In the late war between the United States and Spain thirty days were given in the case of the blockade of Cuba. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 262; 30 U. S. Stat. at L. 1769, No. 6. Where a period of fifteen days was allowed for egress, it was held that egress after that time was cause for condemnation though the delay was caused by inability to obtain a tug. In The Diana, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 354, Field, J., said: "The case, however, must be one of absolute and uncontrollable necessity; and this must be established beyond reasonable doubt. 'Nothing less,' says Sir William Scott, 'than an uncontrollable necessity, which admits of no compromise, and cannot be resisted,' will be held a justification of the offense. Any rule less stringent than this would open the door to all sorts of fraud. Attempted evasions of the blockade would be excused upon pretenses of distress and danger, not warranted by the facts, but the falsity of which it would be difficult to expose."

2. The Charlotta, Edw. Adm. 252; The Hurtig Hane, 2 C. Rob. 127.

3. Ultimate Destination of Cargo. — The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514; The Springbok, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 1, affirming Blatchf. Prize Cas. 380, 434. In this latter case the vessel was seized on its voyage between London and Nassau by a Federal cruiser, on the ground that she intended to run the blockade, and while the ship was released by the Supreme Court, the cargo was condemned.

Doctrine of Continuous Voyages. — This was an application of the doctrine of continuous voyages, invented by Sir William Scott in connection with the rule of war of 1756, by which rule it was held to be incompatible with neutrality for a subject of a neutral state to engage in time of war in a commerce between a belligerent and its colonies, if such commerce was forbidden by the latter belligerent in time of peace; and, by the doctrine named, a voyage from an intermediate port to the mother country was held to be continuous with that between the colony and the intermediate port. The Maria, 5 C. Rob. (Reprint) 325; The William, 5 C. Rob. (Reprint) 349. See Lawrence on Int. Law, § 276; Dana's Wheaton's Int. Law, note 231.

4. Comments on the Springbok Case. — The effect of the general application of the doctrine of this case would seem to give to a belligerent power a right to stop a neutral vessel in any part of the world in order to determine whether it contains goods which are to be subsequently forwarded from the vessel's destination to a blockaded port. This decision has been severely criticised by practically all the European writers on international law, Bluntschli going so far as to say that it inflicted a more serious blow to neutral rights than did all the orders in council put together. It was, however, approved by the British commissioner when the case came before the Mixed Claims Commission under the treaty of Washington in May, 1877.

See Wharton's Dig. Int. Law, § 362, where will be found a full presentation of the various arguments which have been presented adverse to the correctness of this decision.

5. Inland Conveyance of Goods. — This was decided in the case of The Peterhoff, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 28, in which the vessel and cargo were carried into the Mexican port of Matamoras, a Mexican town on the Rio Grande, with a possibility of ulterior destination to the blockaded port of Brownsville; the court distinguishing this case from that of The Bermuda, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 514, in which the vessel and her cargo were condemned because en-and the English decisions are to the effect that there is no such violation when the carriage of the goods from or to the blockaded port is by means of inland canals communicating with the sea at a point not blockaded.¹

(6) Evidence of Violation. — Among the various facts tending to show an intention to violate a blockade, or the reverse, are the position of the vessel, the condition of the ship's papers, the character of the cargo, and the actions of the owners, officers, and crew;² and the fact that the vessel or the owners thereof had previously been occupied in violating the blockade may be considered.³

f. DURATION OF DELICTUM. — A ship which has broken a blockade is considered to be taken in delicto, and therefore liable to condemnation, if captured in any part of the same voyage, and the voyage for this purpose includes her return;⁴ but she is not liable if the blockade ceased between the time of sailing and her capture,⁵ nor is she liable to capture after the termination of her voyage.⁶ The cargo, on the other hand, remains liable to condemnation after its transshipment from the vessel in which it was carried through the blockade, provided there were unbroken ownership and control.⁷

g. PENALTY FOR VIOLATION. — As a general rule, the penalty for a breach gaged in a voyage ostensibly for a neutral port, but in reality, either directly or by substitution of another vessel, for a blockaded port, while the Peterhoff "was destined for a neutral port with no ulterior destination for the ship or none by sea for the cargo to any blockaded place." of blockade is the confiscation of both ship and cargo. If the vessel and cargo are owned by different persons, however, the vessel may be condemned without the cargo, and the latter will be exempt if the owner did not know, or was not in a situation to know, of the blockade at the time of shipment; but if he had such knowledge, the cargo is liable, although the master without authority deviated to a blockaded port,¹ it being presumed that he did so in the service of the cargo.² The vessel is not, however, liable to confiscation merely because of the guilty destination of the cargo, if the owners or persons in control of the vessel are not in fraudulent connection therewith.³

6. Visit and Search — a. RIGHT IN GENERAL. — A neutral mercantile vessel, or a vessel carrying a neutral flag, is, as a rule, liable to visit and search by a war vessel of a belligerent for the purpose of determining whether the vessel is really neutral and whether it contains any cargo subject to capture;⁴ and this right of visit and search, it is said, necessarily carries with it all the means essential to its exercise, among which may be included the assumption of the disguise of a friend or an enemy, or the pursuit of the neutral vessel, though this result in its stranding or loss.⁵ In time of peace no right of visit and search exists,⁶ but vessels of war may approach vessels at sea for the purpose of ascertaining their character, and these latter cannot forcibly resist such approach, though not obliged to await it.⁷

b. OF VESSELS OF WAR. — A neutral vessel of war or other government vessel is, on the other hand, not subject to visit and search.⁸

c. OF MAIL VESSELS. — No exemption arises merely because the neutral vessel has a government mail on board.⁹

d. OF VESSELS UNDER CONVOY. — Whether neutral merchantmen are subject to this right when they are under the convoy of vessels of their own nation, has been a subject of much controversy, and occasionally of serious dispute between nations.¹⁰ The text writers and many jurists of the United States and England deny the existence of any exemption in such a case,¹¹ unless it is secured by treaty,¹² while on the continent of Europe the view

In The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 440, Justice Story said: "The law * * * deems the sailing under convoy as an act per se inconsistent with neutrality, as a premeditated attempt to oppose, if practicable, the right of search, and therefore attributes to such preliminary act the full effect of actual resistance."

12. The United States have frequently embodied in treaties, especially with other American states, a declaration giving exemption from has generally been taken that a neutral vessel under convoy is exempt from search if the officer in command of the vessels of war constituting the convoy affirms the neutral character of the merchant vessel and the absence from the cargo of prohibited commodities.¹ Fortunately the possibility of serious international differences arising from the difference of views upon the subject grows steadily less as speed becomes more and more the chief item of commercial success and the possibility of uniting in one fleet vessels of different rates of speed is so rendered impracticable.²

e. MODE OF EXERCISING RIGHT.—The exercise of the right of visit is attended with certain formalities which are not very clearly defined, though quite frequently they form the subject of treaty stipulations.³ The vessel of war usually fires a gun as a warning to the neutral vessel to bring to, but this is not essential;⁴ and an officer is generally sent on board the merchantman, but the master of the merchantman may be brought on board the belligerent vessel, with his ship's papers, for examination.⁵ It is not necessary to man the vessel with a prize master and crew during the search, but the captain of the war vessel may detain the other merely by orders from his own vessel, which the officers of the other are bound to obey.⁶ The right of search must be conducted with due regard to the safety of the vessel being searched, and the captors are liable for damage resulting from their failure to exercise proper care in managing the vessel during the search.⁷

f. RESISTANCE TO SEARCH—(1) In General.—A resistance to the exercise of the right of search is in itself ground for the capture and subsequent condemnation of a vessel, since by so doing it forfeits its neutral character;⁸ and the result has been held to be the same when the resistance is by a convoy.⁹ It is, however, a sufficient excuse for such resistance that the neutral vessel did not know of the existence of war and had no reasonable grounds to believe in its existence.¹⁰

(2) Effect on Cargo.—In case of resistance to search by a neutral vessel, the cargo therein, though belonging to a different owner, has been stated to be liable to confiscation along with the vessel, this case being distinguished from the case of resistance by an enemy vessel, in which case the neutral cargo is not subject to confiscation.¹¹ The United States Supreme Court has carried the immunity of neutral cargo on an enemy's vessel to the point of deciding that such cargo is not liable to confiscation though the enemy's vessel is armed and makes resistance to capture,¹² a view which, however, was

12. The Nereide, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 388. In this case the court was divided, the decision in favor of the neutral cargo being concurred in by three judges, a majority of the court. Marshall, C. J., speaking for the majority, said: "The object of the neutral is the transportation of his goods. His connection with the vessel which transports them is the same whether that vessel be armed or unarmed. The act of arming is not his; it is the act of a party who has a right so to do. He meddles not with the armament nor with the war. Whether his goods were on board or not, the vessel would be armed and would sail. His goods do not contribute to the armament further than the freight he pays, and freight he would pay were the vessel unarmed." Story, J., rendered an elaborate dissenting opinion. See the very full examination of this

g. CONCLUSION OF SEARCH. — If the ship's papers or other circumstances give no reason for suspicion, the vessel is allowed to proceed, and detention after ineffectual search is unjustifiable.²

h. CAPTURE — (1) What Constitutes. — In order to constitute a capture some act should be done indicative of an intention to seize and to retain as prize, but it is sufficient if such intention is fairly to be inferred from the conduct of the captor.³ The captor must place on the captured vessel a sufficient prize crew, unless the captured crew consents to navigate her, in which case a prize master is generally placed on board to show that the capture is not abandoned.⁴ Property may, however, be condemned as prize though it was not actually taken by force or out of hostile possession, it being enemy property or engaged in illegal traffic.⁵

(2) Who May Capture. — Captures may be made by any officer or citizen of a belligerent nation,⁶ and the fact that the capture is by a noncommissioned vessel affects only the captor's interest in the prize so captured.⁷

(3) Effect of Rescue. — A rescue or attempted rescue of a neutral vessel after capture has the same effect as resistance in depriving the vessel of its neutral character and exposing it to condemnation.⁸

i. SHIP'S PAPERS — (1) General Requirements. — In time of war a neutral vessel should have papers evidencing its nationality and ownership and that of the cargo, a roll of the crew, the log-book, and the charter-party, manifests, or bills of lading, the exact description of the papers varying according to the nationality of the vessel; and the absence of such papers, or omissions therein, will constitute considerations adverse to the legality of the commerce being carried on by the vessel.⁹

(2) False Papers. — The possession of false papers is in itself probable cause for the capture of a neutral vessel,¹⁰ but is not in itself a cause for its condemnation unless the falsification was for the purpose of deceiving the capturing belligerent, since it may as well have been intended to deceive his enemy.¹ It is, however, strong evidence of a guilty design, and may be decisive as to the enemy ownership of the vessel or cargo or the illegal character of the voyage.²

(3) Spoilation or Concealment.—The spoliation or concealment of a ship's papers in anticipation of visit and search, if fairly explained, does not affect the vessel or its owners with any liability.³ If, however, it be unexplained, or the explanation be unsatisfactory, or there be other suspicious circumstances, it is made the ground for denial of further proof, and condemnation will ensue from defects in the evidence which the party is not permitted to supply.⁴

j. DUTIES AND LIABILITIES OF CAPTORS—(1) As to Persons and Property on Board.—The captors have no right to make any spoliation upon or in any way to injure the ship or its contents, or to embezzle or convert the property therein, or to break bulk, except in case of overruling necessity or emergency.⁵ It is also the duty of the captors to bring in as witnesses the master and principal officers of the captured vessel.⁶ The captor cannot, however, treat persons on board as prisoners of war, and if he maltreats them he is liable in damages.⁷

(2) As to Care of Vessel.—When the capture is justified, the captors are not responsible for subsequent losses or injuries to the property arising from mere accident or stress of weather.⁸ They are, however, liable in damages in case the prize be lost through negligence or misconduct.⁹ And in such case the damages are generally fixed at the actual value of the property,¹⁰ though other items of damage may be allowed according to the nature and circumstances of the case.¹

(3) Sending In Vessel for Adjudication. — It is the duty of the captor to send the prize into some convenient port of the country of the captor for adjudication.² A convenient port has been stated to be such a port as the ship may enter and ride in with safety without unloading.³ And in selecting such port the convenience of both captors and probable claimants should be consulted.⁴ In some cases, however, the captor may be excused from so sending in the captured property for adjudication, and may sell it or otherwise dispose of it before condemnation, as when he cannot spare a sufficient prize crew to man the vessel, or when he is forbidden by orders from his government to send it in, or it is not in a condition to be sent.⁵

(4) Destruction of Prizes. — There has been considerable discussion as to the right of the captor to destroy a captured vessel instead of bringing it into port, and this has been done in some instances.⁶ Such destruction has been generally regarded as permissible when the circumstances do not permit the captors to bring in the prize;⁷ and provided the captor, before so doing, clearly ascertains that the property is liable to condemnation as being enemy's and not neutral property, there seems nothing in the practice which could give ground for objection, since nobody is injured thereby, except perhaps the captor himself.⁸

(5) Proceeding to Adjudication and Restitution. — If the captors unjustifiably neglect to proceed to adjudication, the court will, in case of restitution, decree demurrage against them,⁹ and the same will be done if the captors, after agreeing to restitution, unreasonably delay.¹⁰

This was also done by the Confederate cruisers during the civil war, on the ground that there were no blockaded ports into which the prizes could be brought. In 1870 two German vessels were destroyed by a French cruiser owing to want of sufficient men to man them, and in 1877 the Russians destroyed some prizes in the Black Sea because the Russian ports were blockaded. See Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 150; Lawrence on Int. Law, § 215.

stances as will form a reasonable ground for suspicion that the vessel is engaged in an illegal traffic,¹ and the fact that a court restores the vessel without ordering further proof does not of itself show a lack of probable cause.² Probable cause for the capture deprives the owner of the captured vessel of the right to costs,³ and, though restitution is decreed, it will authorize the allowance of reasonable costs and expenses to the captors,⁴ but this allowance is not always made in such a case.⁵

The Person Responsible in damages is, in the case of a capture by a vessel of war, the person ordering the seizure, as being the actual wrongdoer; and consequently an admiral or a commodore cannot be made liable for a seizure ordered by a commander of a vessel without the concurrence of the superior officer,⁶ while in the case of capture by privateers, both the owners and the master of the privateer are liable.⁷

(7) Recapture.—When a captured vessel or cargo is recaptured by a fellow subject of the original owner, or by the subject of an ally of his government, the property is, as a general rule, returned to such original owner, provided he pays salvage to the persons making the recapture. The cases in which restitution is made and the conditions of restitution vary, however, in different countries, the United States restoring only when the recapture has been effected before condemnation in a prize court, while England and several other nations make restitution in all cases. The subject is regulated generally by prize acts in the different countries.⁸

INTER PARTES.—Between parties. Instruments in which the parties unite are said to be inter partes.⁹

INTERPLEADER.—See 11 ENCYC. OF PL. AND PR. 444.

INTERPOSE.—To interpose means to present or put forward as an obstruction or interruption.¹⁰

1. Essentials of Probable Cause.—The St. Antonius, 1 Act. 113; The Thompson, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 155; The George, 1 Mason (U. S.) 24; The Ship Liverpool Packet, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 513; The Rover, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 240.

2. Story, J., in The George, 1 Mason (U. S.) 24.

3. Effect of Probable Cause.—The Argonaut, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 62; The Forest King, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 45; The General Green, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 40, 654; The Hannah M. Johnson, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 35; The Jane Campbell, Blatchf. Prize Cas. 101; Ingraham v. The Brig Nayade, Newb. Adm. 366.

4. The Mary, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 126; The Venus, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 127; The London Packet, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 132; The Apollon, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 362; The Thompson, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 155.

In The Dashing Wave, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 170, there being probable cause of capture, the costs and expenses upon restitution were ratably apportioned between the vessel and a part of the cargo which was of a suspicious character, without contribution by the balance of the cargo.

5. The Sir William Peel, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 517.

6. Person Responsible in Damages.—The Mentor, 1 C. Rob. 179; The Diligentia, 1 Dods. 404; The Eleanor, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 346.

7. Capture by Privateers.—Die Fire Damer, 5 C. Rob. (Reprint) 318; Der Mohr, 3 C. Rob. 129; Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dods. 290; The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 327; The Amiable Nancy, 1 Paine (U. S.) 111; Dias v. The Privateer Revenge, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 262;

The Mary, 1 Mason (U. S.) 365; Talbot v. Three Brigs, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 95.

8. Recapture.—Hall on Int. Law (4th ed.), § 166.

Rev. Stat. U. S., § 4652 (Act June 30, 1864), provides that "a meet and competent sum as salvage, according to the circumstances of each case," shall be awarded by the court, and also that if the recaptured property belonged to a person resident or under the protection of a foreign government in amity with the United States, it shall be restored upon the same conditions that would be required of a citizen of the United States upon a recapture by persons belonging to such state.

For decisions under the Act of March 3, 1800, c. 14, which was the basis of and substantially similar to the present act, see The Schooner Adeline, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 244; The Star, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 78.

9. Inter Partes.—In Smith v. Emery, 12 N. J. L. 60, it was said: "The instrument of writing set forth in this declaration is what is technically called an instrument inter partes; that is to say, it is expressed to be made between certain parties, between the persons who are named in it as executing it. In such case it is a settled rule that although a covenant be expressed in the instrument for the benefit of a third person named in it, an action can be brought in the name of one of the parties only, and not in the name of such third person."

10. Usury. (See also the title USURY).—In Rosa v. Butterfield, 33 N. Y. 665, Davis, J., said: "The Act of 1850 is entitled, 'An Act to prohibit corporations from interposing the defense of usury in any action.' The first section, which is the only one necessary to be referred to in these cases, is in these words: 'Section 1. No corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action.' (Laws of 1850, c. 172, p. 234.) Plain as the language of this section may appear to be, it is on its face suggestive of several constructions. In a strictly narrow sense, to interpose a defense in an action is to plead it or to set it up by answer. In that sense the section would be construed simply to debar a corporation from thereafter pleading usury as a defense, thus reducing it to a rule of pleading, but operating effectively to prevent proof of usury, under the settled rule which excludes the evidence whenever the fact is not pleaded. In that view it would apply only to pleas or answers thereafter to be interposed, and not to issues already joined. But the courts have not hesitated to reject this construction and to hold that to interpose the defense of usury, within the meaning of the act, was to set it up or insist upon it in any manner at any stage of the action."
